

Klamath Fighters Go Well in Medford

Three Klamath Falls fighters last night featured at Medford in a fight card put on there. Jess Hottinger, Klamath Falls, fighting the 10-round main event against Gene O'Grady, Ashland, lost by a decision.

It was a hard fought battle, and it was not until O'Grady came back in the last two rounds full of fight, that it was decided who would be the winner.

Chiff Hottinger, also of Klamath Falls, knocked out Kid Wagner, Medford, in the fourth round of a six-round fight. William Wilson, also of this city, won on a foul from Pat Pelaford of Medford.

Two Boys Caught Stealing Articles

After giving two lads, both under 12 years of age, a lecture on the seriousness of shop lifting, Keith Ambrose released them and ordered them back to school yesterday.

Entering the Variety Store about 5 o'clock Thursday, the two boys stole a number of small articles.

For one lad, this theft is the first offense, while the second one has been implicated in other robberies at the Golden Rule, Variety Store and Wohlworth's.

a capacity house with many Klamath sports fans present. Bill Elliott, manager of the Waldorf, brought the results to the News just before press time.

Printers' Union Holds Election

M. A. McClure was elected president of the Klamath branch of the International Typographical union at a recent meeting.

Other officers elected for the coming year are: William Long, vice president; William Webb, secretary-treasurer; and George Rowe, sergeant-at-arms.

Retiring officers are: George Webber, president; William Webb, vice president; Nate Otterbein, secretary-treasurer; and George Rowe, sergeant-at-arms.

The union is conducting a label campaign to stimulate business for local shops.

Dirigible 400 Miles Off Shore

is 48 miles an hour and about 80 miles an hour was said to be her maximum speed in trial flights before she left Friedrichshafen, Germany.

According to the message, the Graf Zeppelin expects to reach Lakehurst, N. J., Sunday noon—considerably sooner than had been indicated by early stages of the flight. Apparently favorable winds were driving the big craft westward along a route just south of the North Atlantic storm area.

In Air 47 Hours

The Graf Zeppelin had been in the air 47 hours at 12:51 a. m. (EST) Saturday, as she moved southwest from the Azore islands.

Late Friday a radio report was received in the Azore islands giving the Zeppelin's position as approximately 260 miles southwest of the Azores. This message was cabled to the United Press from Horta, Azores, by the United Press correspondent there.

Later a message to the United Press from Captain Benson of the Steamship President Monroe said:

"Graf Zeppelin at 7 p. m. Friday 330 miles west of Madeira. Speed 75 miles per hour. Altitude 1400 feet. Weather good. Heading Bermuda."

Arrive By Noon Sunday

The report of the ship's position from Horta and that given in the dispatch from the President Monroe were in conflict, but if the ship is to arrive at noon Sunday, then the report from Horta would seem approximately correct. Navy experts, on the other hand, believed that the ship would not arrive until late Sunday, under which circumstances the report from the President Monroe would seem the most accurate.

Although the exact nautical position of the dirigible was temporarily in doubt, she was in constant communication with ships and various stations by radio and at 9 p. m. (EST) was known to be making good progress westward over the great circle course running southward of the Azores.

Route 5,498 Miles

The Graf Zeppelin's indicated route will cover approximately 5,498 miles from Friedrichshafen, Germany, to New York, and under the present conditions the big dirigible, with her 29 passengers and her crew of 49 under the command of Dr. Hugo Eckener, should complete the first commercial trans-Atlantic air trip in about 91 hours.

The distance, based on ship routes, follows:

Friedrichshafen to Barcelona, 642 miles.

Barcelona to Gibraltar, 552 miles.

Gibraltar to Funchal, Madeira, 798 miles.

Funchal to Bermuda, 2,812 miles.

Bermuda to New York, 784 miles. Total 5,498 miles.

Fought Head Winds

After her trip from Friedrichshafen, across to France, down the Rhone valley, and along the Mediterranean coast line to Barcelona, Spain, the Graf Zeppelin spent Thursday night fighting severe headwinds enroute to Gibraltar.

Soaring out over the Atlantic at last, the dirigible reached Funchal, Madeira, at 5:30 a. m. (EST). She passed over the 35-mile long island, which is 440 miles off the Moroccan coast, and slipped away on her long over-water flight, apparently to Bermuda.

After the long detour forced by storms, the Graf Zeppelin was making good time and moving steadily westward on a line south of the Azores islands.

May Face Storm

Commander Charles E. Rosendahl, U. S. N., one of three Americans aboard the Graf Zeppelin, asked the navy department at Washington for Atlantic weather reports. His radio message requested especially information about conditions at Bermuda. The navy department immediately informed Commander Rosendahl that the forecast for the route south of the Azores was low clouds, a cross wind, and a head wind, which would not be especially favorable.

Conditions to the north, however, were worse, and it was believed the southern route which the dirigible is following to Bermuda would be comparatively favorable. The navy report noted that a 35-mile wind was blowing at the Azores and that indications were the wind would shift west and northwest Saturday.

ATTEMPTS COMMUNICATION

NEW YORK, Oct. 12. (UP)—The dirigible Graf Zeppelin early today attempted to get in communication with the naval air station at Lakehurst, N. J.

A message from an unidentified ship at 2:50 a. m., was intercepted by the Radio Marine corporation. This message said that the dirigible had been calling for Lakehurst for several minutes.

There was no indication of the dirigible's position.
