Every Violin

Somewhere in the violin,
Tangled in its strings,
Are the tragedies and joys
That a lifetime brings:
Pain and passion—tenderness—
Faith and gray despair,
In a Stradivarius lives,
Are hidden there
Beauty of the world in flower,
When the spring is new,
Sun-washed hills in summer time,
Midnight skies of blue,
Marching armies—bugle calls—
Autumn winds, that pass
Like a troupe of merry elves
Through the drying grass;
Lovers whispering at dawn
Of nights yet to be,
Throbbing notes from ships a-sail
On a calm sea,
All that human hearts may sense
Of life—without—within—
Is hidden, too, deep in the soul
Of every violin.

and Ida Giovanni, grade 2 high, Pelican City, chose "Sparrow House," by Grishina.

One of the essays chosen for honorable mention in the contest follows:

"Merrylips," by Heulah Marie Dix, is my favorite book. Merrylips was a little girl in the time of Charles I. I like the book because I feel in sympathy with Merrylips. She wanted to be a boy. I do, too. She was never happier than when with her brothers. She wanted to go to war, and did, too. I think Merrylips was very brave. I like the book because it is so amusing in places. Earl Whitlock's... History of Oregon

In the convention of 1818 the boundary between Canada and the United States was fixed at the line of 49 degrees North from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, the land west of this point to be open to both parties for ten years.

It will be seen, therefore, that for a time the political faith of our state was in the hands of fate. Only time could tell whether the Union Jack or the Stars and Stripes would eventually fly over this territory.

The Will to Achieve

The constant application of ideals to one's work, together with an ambition to succeed in spite of all obstacles, have been largely responsible for the high position we have attained in our profession.
