"Dictated But Not Read"

REALLY, now this thing of the letter is getting with its postscript, "Dictated, but not read," it is an insult to the man to whom the letter is written. A letter not worth reading over for possible corrections by the writer is not worth reading by the person to whom it is addressed. In the second place, the phrase is a bad fake adopted for the most part to convey the idea that the writer or the dictator has such a vast volume of correspondence that he cannot find time to attend to it. In the third place, the phrase is often designed as a loophole for escape from the contract character of the letter. It enables the man who sends it to lay the blame upon the stenographer when he wants to recede from some statement or promise made in the epistle.

Too bad we haven't the name of the man who returned to the sender one of these "Dictated, but not read" letters with the scribble at the top, "Opened, but not read," that we might do him appropriate honor. Away with this bad and fake and devious trick! Let us not answer any letter that carries the idiotic or disingenuous legend. It is worse than that cheap bromide from the guy who wants something for nothing, who signs himself, "Thanking you in advance."—William M. Reedy.
