DOGWOOD

It is April days that bring
For dogwood blooms the early call,
When summer beauty waits beyond,
And winter snows have ceased to fall
At that good time I found a prize
That made the soul of me exclaim:
"Ah, here it is, a tiny bit
Of that old Eden that we aim
To find again, and this is mine.
A dogwood tree in early bloom,
And here I find a homestead claim,
Where shrublets of an unseen loom
Has patterned this, or well I know,
The greenest wood is not complete
Without the unseen artist weaves
A starrings of the dogwood sweet."

—EMILY PATTERSON SPEAR.

SOCIAL COMMENT

The poem leading society this week will remind many who plan to preside as hostesses at spring social functions that dogwood with its large petaled, pure white flowers make one of the most lovely of spring decorations.

Wooden beads, which are a popular accessory for that sport costume, are seen in the Fifth avenue shops of New York, and also in this city. These beads have a distinctive American appearance since they resemble the brightly colored, odd shaped beads with which the Indians adorned themselves in the buckskin days.

Those who thrill to adventure, especially that of pioneering a new country, will find an absorbing article in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post, "Gentlemen of the North." It is an account of the two lines of steel which are penetrating into the wilderness of Canada, and of the shack cities along its route where women are few and chivalry an unwritten code. Once read it is not easily forgotten.

"Sunday" is one of the most satisfying shades found among the new spring line, and is a shade which will go with almost any costume in the wardrobe.

Perhaps someone with a large vocabulary and an ability for expression should write an article on "How to Look Carefully Careless," for this is the mode of appearance which the youth of the land has adopted. It really takes a lot of planning and careful study of one's personality and looks to attain that careless air.

Mary Roberts Rinchart's "This Strange Adventure" which appeared as a serial in a well-known magazine last year, may now be found in book form at the city library. It is one of a large number of new books recently received.
