THE NORMAL potato crop in this country is around three and one-half bushels per person, and in one way or another we consume it all, for potatoes are not carried over from year to year.

YET in the face of this situation which should ordinarily insure active buying at good prices, the market is sluggish and prices are far below the opening figures.

HERE is another explanation, given to this writer yesterday by an exceptionally shrewd buyer: People generally haven't yet realized that there is an impending potato shortage, and hence are not bidding up for the existing supply.

HE ILLUSTRATED it this way: "If the normal crop is represented by 1000 sacks, this year's crop would be represented by 850 sacks, for this year's crop is about 15 per cent below normal."
