Methodists Hit Martin

GOVERNOR MARTIN can absorb more hard licks than Jim Braddock. Whenever people get together for a convention, it seems they can't adjourn without taking a crack at the governor. Few men in public life in this state have had more mean things and more admiring things said about them.

The past weekend the Methodists, in conference here, conformed to convention procedure adopted by the grange and labor, and slapped at the governor. They blamed him because Oregon, instead of permitting private profits and attendant abuses from the retail sale of hard liquor, recovers the profits for the state and uses them to finance the relief program.

Whether or not the governor should have the blame or the credit for this plan, it has its merits. If Oregon was going to legalize the sale of liquor, and it was inevitable that it would, using the retail sale profits therefrom for meeting the financial needs of the relief program was a sensible thing to do.

One can understand church opposition to legalizing liquor. But it is not quite so clear why church people should fight an effort to save something, out of the inevitable, for assisting the state in caring for its poor and unfortunate.

Hence we do not believe the conference criticism of the governor, in this connection, was justified.

Hail to Queen Nonie

IT is fitting and proper that a ranch girl should be queen of the Buckaroo Days celebration.

She is Nonie McCartie, 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jerry McCartie of the Bonanza country.

Queen Nonie has ridden horses ever since she can remember. She has broken horses. As a horsewoman, she is unexcelled. And in addition to that, she is charming and gracious and attractive. She is an excellent queen.

Likewise, the princesses are ranch girls. Stella Shuck of Merrill and Pauline Suty of Malin represent the south-end country. Evelyn Campbell and Queen Nonie come from the Bonanza section. The Fort Klamath country is charmingly represented by Marie Loosley. All are lovely girls and good riders.

The contest proved highly successful, and no doubt will become a permanent part of the Buckaroo Days celebration.

Behind the Scenes in Washington

By RODNEY DUTCHER

WASHINGTON, June 28.—The national capital has a slightly closer contact with the labor movement than derives from the fact that Bill Green, John Lewis, Frances Perkins, Ed McGrady, Bob LaFollette and Warren Madden live here. But not much.

Local industry means little more than the few breweries, ice cream plants, roach powder and patent medicine factories needed to take care of the city. Although strikes are a major conversational topic, there hasn't been one of consequence here since anyone can remember.

But now, the fact that the CIO is going to take governmental employees into its ranks is causing a certain amount of excitement—not to say concern. The specter of an army of federal employees owing allegiance to or taking orders from John L. Lewis is calculated to give the willies to anyone who normally spends much time worrying about John L. Lewis.

There are two unions of federal employees already formed. Neither bears close resemblance to a labor union and both bar strikes and picketing as weapons. Although one—the American Federation of Government Employees—is affiliated with the A. F. of L.

Against Government Economy

President William Green has other annoyances which make the prospect of a CIO raid on the AFGE seem a relatively insignificant problem. Yet, if the office girls and secretaries in the executive branch are going to sign up with Lewis, the day may come when Green won't be able to call on a cabinet member with any assurance that he won't be made to cool his heels unnecessarily.

Perhaps the most interesting point of the proposal of some government employees to get into the CIO, however, is the fact that this group has been conspicuous in a campaign against government economy. The AFGE suspended seven of its lodges because they staged a mass meeting against what they called "foolish false economy." Officials of the lodges have asked Lewis to help them in their campaign.

Lewis, apparently after considerable cogitation, acted. He selected Jacob Baker, former assistant administrator of WPA and chairman of a group sent to inquire into European co-operative industries, to organize government workers into a new branch of the CIO. It will be called the United Federal Workers of America.

This brought fresh worries to many viewers—with alarm who can easily conjure up visions of a militant labor movement demanding more pay, a closed shop and no dismissals on behalf of its members in government service.

The anti-economy drive, which is in the form of a plea that government savings not be taken out of the hides of employees, arises from the not unnatural desire of government clerks to hang onto their jobs. Most outsiders agree that there are more federal employees here than the government needs.

The Hysterical Drive
A letter circulated among members of the suspended lodges says in part:
"Foolish false economy in 1933 fired efficient government employees to save money and then wasted more than had been saved by employing other untrained workers to replace discharged efficient workers. Foolish false economy reduced salaries, eliminated leaves, ended Section 213 and yet, after the hysterical drive was over, the government was spending more money than when the drive was initiated. All that survives of the foolish false economy act of 1932 is section 213. All that foolish false economy achieved was the reduction of the incomes of the lowest paid families in Washington to a point below the existence line."

"Section 213" is the so-called married persons clause which in effect bars husbands and wives from both holding government jobs.

The letter, written before Lewis started the organization drive, says the anti-economy committee has asked CIO support and adds:

"As you know, John L. Lewis and the Committee for Industrial Organization supported the president in the last election. You also know that the CIO has important powerful advocates in congress and the White House. With the support of the CIO, the Committee Against False Economy will defeat foolish false economy. With the support of the CIO, it will organize all government workers into one strong union that will be able to work effectively in the interests of the government worker and for government efficiency."

The Family Doctor

In patients who are definitely overweight and who suffer at the same time with disorders of the heart or kidneys, it may be necessary to prescribe complete rest in bed with a diet consisting largely of milk and fruit juices.

In considering the control of overweight, it is always well to remember the tendency of overweight to run in families. Seventy per cent of all those who are overweight usually are found to have mothers or fathers who are also overweight.

This does not mean, however, that the condition is hereditary. Most often it is due to the fact that the children live under the same conditions as do their parents.

If the parents eat too much, the children are likely to eat too much; if the parents exercise too little, therefore, the children exercise too little.

However, it will be found that the fat is deposited in the same portions of the body as in the adults. This is due to the fact that the body structure of the child is inherited.

In one family, the women will tend to fat arms and relatively thin hips, whereas in other families they will have fat hips and relatively thin arms.

Mothers have been so driven to nourish their children adequately that they are constantly between the fires of underweight and overweight. Moreover, the exact weights and heights for children of various ages have not been definitely determined.

Mothers are anxious to see their children grow that they are likely to urge them into the development of a large appetite. Then the children get to eating more than they require.

The fat child usually is being teased by his friends and often he develops a peculiar mental attitude. Simply because the child is fat, he tends to take less exercise. Thus he develops what is called a vicious circle.
