College Boy, Pilot Instructor Killed in Spokane Crash

SPOKANE, Wash., April 24 (AP)—A college student who went aloft to celebrate his 20th birthday and a veteran flight instructor who once had bailed out of a crippled plane, died yesterday when their training plane crashed in a wheat field 10 miles northeast of Spokane.

They were Warren Brooks, an engineering student at Gonzaga university, and Don Jones, 35, a Wenatchee club owner here as an instructor under the civilian pilot training program.

College friends of young Brooks said he had planned to play tennis, but telephoned them late in the day saying he had decided to celebrate instead with a training flight. He had been in training about three months.

Witnesses said the plane was circling about 500 feet above the wheat field when it suddenly slipped off on one wing and nosed to earth. Deputy Sheriff Pat Griffin said apparently both men were killed outright when the force of the crash pushed the motor back into the cockpit.

Friends of the instructor said he took to his parachute last year to save his life when a plane developed engine trouble. Both Jones and Brooks were wearing parachutes. Authorities could not explain the crash, but believed the lack of altitude kept the men from jumping.
