What Free-Trade will do and has done lor a manufacturing industry is shown by a recent melancholy article in the London "Graphic," which tells of the vanishing silk business of Spitalfields. England, once the center of a hive of industry in which 300,000 persons were directly or indirectly employed. In Spitalfields today there are only about 500 weavers left, a poor remnant of the once great and prosperous community that formerly lived and worked there. Let the American workman compare this sorry picture with the growth of our silk trade, or with the tin plate BRYAN'S ELECTION WOULD business, built up with marvelous rapidity in a few years under Protective Tariff, which has placed the English and Welsh tin works in the same plight, and then let him answer to his family and community if he permits partisan feeling to lead him into voting for Free-

In Germany 180 trusts were organized two years ago and their number has largely increased since then. There is a big German coal trust, and an Austrian rolling mill trust; there are French combinations controlling iron, petroleum, sugar, chemicals and numberless other products. Belgium is overrun with trusts, and these countries have various kinds of Tariffs.

With these European trusts and the abolition of our present Protective Tariff, what is to prevent the combination of American and European trusts in the same line of production? With such combinations, the low wages in the same line of production? With such combinations, the low wages in the combination of the low wages in the same line of production? #### HILL'S MANUEL of Social and Business Forms is one of the most useful volumes ever placed upon the desk of a business or professional man, or upon the table of a drawing room. The items confined within the limits of the book embrace instructions and guides for the city office, student, politician, clergyman, physician, clerk. In fact every person who is in business or engaged in any calling whatever will find information as to the proper manner in which to write any document entering into the various social and business relations of life.
