LONGEVITY IN 19TH CENTURY Professions Compared - Philosophers and Farmers in the Lead. 'Has the past century contributed toward the increase or the diminution of numan longevity?" That was the quesion discussed the other day by a group of French scientists. In comparing the statistics of morality in the nineteenth century with those brought out by Duvillard at the close of the previous century it appears that the average longsvity since 1780 increased by five or six years. Therefore, the question put by our medical celebrity would seem to be answered, the answer pointing to an inrease of the average length of life. But the present effort is to reveal the mirage, if mirage there is, in the figures before us; and that is a thorny problem Dr. Vacher and M. Bertillon fix the average losgevity in the ninetcenth century at 73 years. All things being equal, the number of people who reached the age of 73 was greater in the generations of the nineteenth century than was in those of the eighteenth. Vacher only arrives at approximations. He tried to find out if professions pos sessed any influence over the chances of life, and he was unable to come to a conclusion, because he found centenarians in all professions, even the most unremunerative. For all that, he thinks that he can give the palm to agriculture, because it was in the familles of farmers that he found the greatest number of persons who had reached in advanced age. Here statistics are in accord with the most rational previs-

The profession which presents a happy medium in the matter of longevity is that of the scientist. Among the savants one finds as many men who die young as the number who die very old. We know that Fontenello lived 100 years, and that Chevreul was 103. Among those who reached ages quite respectable, although their years were fewer in number, are Humboldt, who died at 90; Newton, at 85; Franklin, at 84, and Buffon, at S1.

The list of those who died very young. like Bichat and Paschal, is just as long; but it includes, unfortunately, the martyrs of science, those who fell upon the field of honor in the effort to harvest in Sweden, Solokoff in Russia and many others. Such deaths are beyond the reach of the massive rules of statistics. It is noteworthy, however, that the cel ebrated Cassini family is about the only one in which the dual inheritance of longevity and scientific genius lasted "I went shop through four generations.-Courier des
