GENERAL FRANCIS C. BARLOW, A July 1, 1863. LEADER IN AMERICA'S OLD GUARD.

The veteran soldier whose taking off the crushing weight upon Barlow's isolated other day was division. heralded by local biographical notices about the in a child's primer was one whom future generations must class with the fighting Putoams, Waynes and Starks of the Revolution. The life story of General Francis C. Barlow is the history of the Second ermy corps, and General Barlow had as much to do with making the history of that famous body of soldiers as any man In it, and perhaps more than any, not excepting Hancock himself. Barlow was there first; he was there last, and without such gallant lieutenants as Barlow beither Hancock nor the corps would have soffieved the distinction in battle which fully entitles the latter to be called the "Old Guard" of the Union army. Barlow led in every charge of that corps but one, and then he was lying wounded.

Barlow, first of all, was a volunteer, and that means that be had to fight again as hard and achieve again as much as a West Point graduate before he could obtain chances for distinction and the promotions which would open up other chances to him. How he won his first chance is told in his own official report of his first battle. This report, by the way, is one of the enriosities of that kind of war literature. The battle was the second day at Pair Oaks, when General Howard was ordered to take his brigade out and try to recover ground which the Confederates had captured the previous day. Barlow's regi-ment, the Bixty first New York, was oue of the four under Howard. Howard started with two regiments only, the Sixty-first and Sixty-fourth New York. Early in the action Howard was disabled and turned the command of these two regiments over to Barlow. This is Barlow's account of his first steward-

After advancing some 150 yards we came upon Ga — Pennsylvania volunteers briskly en-gaging the enemy. I requested Colonel B— to cease firing that we might pass in front of im. This was done, and we advanced upon the enemy, who was drawn up in line before us and kept up a heavy firing. After advancing come 25 yards beyond Colonel B——'s regiment I haited among thick undergrowth. Not will-ing to deliver our fire until we could see those Ing to deliver our fire until we could see those opposed to us I ordered the regiment to cease firing. We then moved forward in excellent order some 180 yards, meeting with a heavy Gre, but not seeing the enemy with sufficient distinctness to warrant, in my opinion, our halting and renewing the fire. On arriving upon the creat of a hill within some 20 yards of the road running parallel to the railroad and directly opposite the (former) camp of Casey's division, which the enemy had occupied, the battailen was halted, the enemy be ing plainly in eight by the readside, and at once opened fire, receiving a very heavy one in return. This continued for a considerable time, and it was there that our principal loss occurred. We drove the enemy back and he beased firing. The loss of Barlow's own regiment was 110 killed and wounded, 25 per cent of its fighting strength. Every American soldier recalls at the proper time the Bunker Hill command, "Wait till you see the whites of their eyes,' when the enemy is advancing, but how many of the thousands of the fresh colonois and embryo brigadiers of the last war had the wisdom and coolness to go on a still hunt for the whites of their enemies' eyes through a swampy forest, raked by the fire of unseen riflemen?

Most biographies state that Barlow's galiantry at Fair Oaks was rewarded by e general's star. That is untrue. He was a colonel at Antietam, in command of a demibrigade in the Second corps, which included his own regiment. fact, it was half of the Howard brigade of Fair Oaks and the peninsula. It is a matter of well known history that the Second corps divisions of Sedgwick and Richardson made one of the most desperate charges of the day at Antietam. Richardson was killed while driving the fiery A. P. Hill from the famous sunken road which American valor christened for all time the "Bloody Lane." Barlow was wounded in struggling forward toward the sunken road, and then and there earned that brigadier general's Star.

Another well known story of Antietam is the gallant fight of the Irish brigade. Barlow, with the Sixty-first and Sixtyfourth New York, rushed to the aid of those plucky Irishmen. He attacked the Confederates lying behind the bank of the sunken road, capturing 300 prisoners and 3 battleflags. Then, seeing the ene my advancing upon the right of the Irish brigade, already terribly cut up, he changed front under fire and attacked the new enemy, sheltered behind a stone wall. At some distance from Barlow, upon a knoll in the orchard and cornfield, the Confederates had planted a battery to sweep the approaches to the sunken road. They burled canister and spherical case upon Richardson's men. and a shot of the latter struck Barlow in the groin, giving him a most fearful wound. The Second corps established its repstation there on the line of the "Bloody Lane" at Antietam. Hancock passed over from the Sixth corps to the command of Richardson's division. Barlow was a long time recovering from his wound, and when he returned to the front he was given a brigade in the Eleventh corps. It was upon a circumstauce connected with the history of Barlow's brigade that Howard laid the cause of his disaster at Chancellorsville. Barlow, he says, was his only reserve and was taken away from him when most needed, and had he been where he ought to have been the Eleventh corps line would not have been at the mercy of Stonewall Jackson. With Hancock at its head the Second corps fared well, and Barlow remained with the Eleventh corps, leading a division at Gettysburg. No amount of reuins or courage could have saved the Howard sent the Eleventh corps out upon the plain north of Gettysburg to support the right flank of the First A Brillfant Martial Career, Reginning and corps, which was buttling to hold the Ending With the Second Corps He Was ridge west of the town. Barlow's divi-Wolunteer and Won His Way by Fights sion held the right of the line, and like the brave Sickles next day he marched beyond the basin lands to reach high ground, where he could see something and have coign of vantage worth clinging to. A knoll upon the west bank of Rock creek now bearing his name is an infperishable monument to the hero who drenched its soil with his blood. Ewell's Confederate corps, headed by John B. Gordon and moving as the wind moves and as the waves move, the soldiers dancing with joy at the prospect of a fight upon Yankee soil, fell with its

> The Barlow knoll is the highest point of ground in that vast plain. There Barlow stationed the gallant Wilkeson, telllength of a page ing him to sacrifice himself and his battery to hold the ground, and Barlow stood by to share the sacrifice. Gordon saw that unless Wilkeson's aettery could be put out of the way his line of battle was doomed. Halting the men, he ordered two batteries to train their guns upon Barlow and Wilkeson. Wilkeson's battery was wiped out, the leader was cut down and met the fate only a hero of more than mortal mold can attain. Barlow fell with him upon that blood red knoll. Then followed an episode pleasing to recall as a relief from the terrible pictures of war. Gordon found the bleeding Barlow, unconscious and apparently dying. In his pocket was a letter from his wife, revealing his identity. Gordon at once had him cared for by his own surgeon and sent word under a flag of truce into the Union lines whom he had as a wounded prisoper. Barlow's wife was at that time searching the battlefield for the body of her missing husband. Under the guidance and safe conduet of Gordon's messengers she reached the bedside of the hero in time to save

Barlow recovered from his wound to enter upon the Wilderness campaign. As commander of one of the old divisions of the reorganized Second corps he, for the first time, came under Hancock. During the Wilderness battle Barlow's troops held the left of Hancock's line on the Brock road. He was confronted by Longstreet.

At Spottsylvania Barlow was conspicnous in the preliminary fighting, and on May 10 was ordered to retreat while actually engaged with the enemy.

At the assault of the Bloody Angle, May 12, Barlow's division was in the front line. The soldiers made their way through a thicket more than a mile without guides to the place of attack. When Barlow learned that the commander of the army had made no reconnoissance of the ground and the position to be assailed, and that it was purely guess work, or a case of "go it blind," with the lives of 12,000 men at stake, he felt that he was called upon to lead a forlorn hope. Taking out the valuables and keepsakes on his person, he intrusted them to a friend, with a last message to his faithful wife, who was then a devoted nurse of the soldiers in the hospitals near by. The assault was a success, and his troops were the and leased over the parapets, cheering his men forward. They mounted the breastworks of the enemy and seized some battleflags and prisoners.

In all the fighting of the corps before Petersburg up to midsummer Barlow was conspicuous. At Ream's Station be was borne upon a stretcher, worn out with wounds, sickness and exposure. Word had just reached him that his wife had died from disease contracted while nursing the wounded soldiers. We read of the sick Napoleon carried into battle in a coach and marvel over it, but he was fighting for his own life and crown.

During the pursuit of Lee, after Petersburg fell, Barlow's division led the econd corps column, and by his personal energy and celerity he seized the crossings of the Appemattox and the roads which enabled the Union infantry to close up on the rear of the Confederates while Sheridan stood across their pathway in front. The volunteer colonel had become a major general.

It is the one enterprise which a protective tariff will not foster, but will kill.
