THE BENEFICENT MINISTRY OF IRRIGATION.

In this age of increasing questions and insistent demands that must be met by every real thinker and true man, perhaps the most important appeal for Americans to consider is that made by the people of the arid west. They stand on their barren, sunbaked deserts, where no herbage but the cactus, and no animal but the lizard, can find nourishment, and cry out to the government—"Send us water!"

It is but recently that attention has been paid to this cry. Philanthropists in the east have long been trying to solve the problem of the slums, not knowing that the powerful genius of irrigation is waiting eagerly to do their work by changing the deserts into inviting homes for the poor of the cities. Probably few people realize the true value of this plan or are aware of the many obstacles that its promoters encounter. Our eastern congressmen first had to be assured that the National government will lose nothing by making the necessary appropriations since the settlers will be pledged to pay back the cost of the works, thus making themselves able to say—"this is mine." "the proudest privilege," as Abram Hewitt has written, "next to the birthright of freedom."

Satisfied on this point, the New England members next objected to national irrigation because of the competition which they feared it would bring about with eastern farmers. They have now been assured, however, that the settlers themselves, rising from a condition of poverty to one of comfort, and even wealth, will create a new demand, not only for the products of the soil but also for those of the eastern factories.

Should these arguments fail to convince, the advocate of irrigation has one more proposition which has won over many a skeptic in the business world.

Our trade with the Orient is now only in its infancy; this is due not so much to competition with other countries as to the necessity of carrying our exports over two thousand miles of unproductive country before they are launched on the Pacific. It is evident that the United States could acquire a dominant control over this ocean, and a far reaching influence in the Orient, if it could win in competition with other nations by sending its exports direct from western farms, thus reducing materially their price in foreign markets.

With four hundred million people waiting to be fed in the Orient, the New England farmers need have no immediate fear of supply exceeding demand. Rather let them drive out sectional prejudice, and study the subject of irrigation with so true a comprehension that they may help their government decide the question. "Shall we disregard an opportunity to enlarge the wealth and resources of our country, or shall we make the United States a still more powerful factor in the world's affairs?"

Oddly enough, the one objection that might reasonably be made, seems never to have occurred to easterners. Doubtless they are too loyal to their ancestral homes to realize that very probably the frugal owner of a stony New England farm, where droughts sometimes wither and floods destroy, may be filled with a desire to seek the kinder climate and more grateful soil of the irrigated west, where twenty acres yield more than his one hundred, where the very fence posts blossom and become trees, and the harrowing question "will it rain" comes to no man's lips.

Small wonder if he grow to envy his more fortunate western brother, who in a few years counts his money in thousands, though his only capital at first was a pair of hands, a few acres, and plenty of water. These statements are not the dreams of a visionary, but the actual results of farming with irrigation.

I saw a hundred horrid shapes In awful silence flitting. Had gone like sudden lightning. A myriad sparkling spirits now Had there been there in flaming robe That burned without cessation. And venom-breathing host swept on With one they called starvation. No land that God's hand ever made Was of His beauty barren; The Desert was Replenished Death That sprang from Want and Terror.

I looked again: Behold the scene Had gone like sudden lightning. A myriad sparkling spirits now Had there been there in flaming robe That burned without cessation. And venom-breathing host swept on With one they called starvation. No land that God's hand ever made Was of His beauty barren; The Desert was Replenished Death That sprang from Want and Terror.
