THE KLAMATH PROJECT

SPARSELY SETTLED REGION TO BE TRANSFORMED BY IRRIGATION

The Most Feasible and the Least Expensive of Any of the Irrigation Projects Undertaken By the United States Government.

By E. L. APPLGATE, Secretary Klamath Water Users Association, Klamath Falls, Oregon.

In southeastern Oregon and northwestern California is a vast interior plateau region, cut off from the outside world by mountain barriers and arid exposure sparsely settled, and until recently wholly without transportation facilities—wonderfully rich in its possibilities and only awaiting the enterprise and capital of man for its development. Within this territory and occupying the upper drainage system of the Klamath River is the Klamath Basin in which is situated the Klamath Valley and the tributary, smaller valley of Last River. The whole, including lakes and contiguous swamps, aggregates about 200,000 acres, and has a mean elevation of about 4200 feet above sea level. Nearly all of this area is to be reclaimed and irrigated by the government under what is known as the Klamath Project.

About half of it consists of tule and lake lands to be drained and prepared for irrigation and cultivation. The other portion is composed of foot hill and some what undulating plains lands covered with the characteristic sagebrush of the great interior basin of the west. The upland soil is mainly a rich sandy loam of great uniformity and composed largely of disintegrated and eroded lava with an admixture of volcanic ash and diatomaceous earth, the latter material of plant origin formed in the bottom of the ancient seas which covered the greater part of the Great Basin and of which Klamath Valley is a northwesterly extension. Such soil, characteristic of many of the richest agricultural regions of the world, including much of Italy and the great plains of India, is extremely fertile and of lasting productivity. The lake and tule lands are made up of a volcanic soil containing much organic matter, a vegetable accumulation of ages, and is of a peaty nature.

For a region of high altitude, the climate, while cool, is extremely beautiful and not severe. There is rarely any winter weather before the latter part of December, and but little zero weather during the entire winter. The annual precipitation is about 15 inches with little rain during the summer months. Irrigation is therefore necessary for the successful growing of most crops.

The Klamath Project is one of the most feasible and is the least expensive of any of the government projects thus far undertaken. There is an abundance of water above the land, and ample natural reservoirs. By deepening the basin at the point where the Klamath River enters the pass through the Cascade Mountains, the waters of the lower lakes and swamps can be drawn off and the land reclaimed. This for the initial work of the great enterprise have been advertised, and the system will be completed as rapidly as the land owners can adjust themselves to the new conditions, and excess lands come into the hands of persons qualified to perfect a government water right. With the object of making homes for as many families as possible, such right will not be sold to any one owner for a tract of land exceeding 100 acres and only to a resident of the irrigation district. All landowners being required to sell their own holdings, there is a large area of good land for sale at reasonable figures, prices ranging from about $10 to $25 for unimproved and $25 to $50 per acre for improved land. The purchaser pays for the water right at a cost of about $18 per acre to be paid for in ten equal annual installments without interest. This amounts to less than the ordinary annual water rental paid private ditch companies.

$100 Reward.

I will pay the above reward for a watch my repair department cannot put in perfect running order. L. Alva Lewis.
