It Was Worth That Count!

on I can face the world with a bold heart, and sweep obstacles from my path as fast as I meet them. And, no matter what anybody says, I am sure of your love for all time."

"Yes, to the end of eternity it is yours," she replied.

"And some day," he went on, "I shall have the right to claim you for my wife."

"You have that right now," she murmured. "I would marry you to-night if you wish it."

He started to take her in his arms, but suddenly checked himself.

"Do not tempt me," he said. "I wish to be honorable and honest, and worthy of your love, but it is not always easy to make you my wife now—if I only had the right. But I must not think of such a thing. There is too wide a difference between us. I will not pull you down to my level, but I will grow up to yours. Some day I will be worthy to claim you, and then I will claim you, but I must prove myself first."

"I will wait for you."

"I know you will, but you will not wait with the impatience I shall."

Time passed and then by and by there began to come little scraps of news to the colonel's ears about things that Ben Smith was doing down at town. First he had been admitted to the bar, then he had won a case of importance after a fight that was marvellous for keen management. Then there were rumors that he was developing into a great orator, and was forcing his way to the top in political matters. But all this made little impression on the colonel, and he was still bitterly opposed to the idea of a family alliance with the Smiths.

Major Buck, although he had about abandoned all hope of winning Miss Emily, was not averse to making numerous and lengthy visits at the Clifton home. He enjoyed the colonel's society very much, and he enjoyed the colonel's dinners even more. The colonel gave him a warm welcome always, for he still had hopes of having him as a member of the family.

But after awhile the major ceased to make his visits to the colonel, and shortly after that it transpired that the colonel was badly involved financially. When the whole truth came out it was found that the colonel had been going security for the major for large sums of money, and that the major, forgetting his family honor, had come away leaving his debts for the colonel to pay.

The colonel would have lost everything if Ben Smith had not taken matters in hand, and, by resorting to coercive measures, induced Major Buck to pay his own debts. This saved the colonel's possessions, and at the same time it softened his heart toward Ben Smith to such an extent that he reluctantly consented for Emily to marry him. He probably concluded from the constancy of the two young people that this would inevitably happen sooner or later, and thought he might as well give his consent and have it over. It was easy to see, though, that he was by no means pleased, and that he looked down on Ben as a creature very much inferior to himself.

After the marriage things drifted along in the even tenor of their way, Ben and the colonel seeing but little of each other, and the latter seldom mentioning the former's name. All the time, however, Ben was hard at work building up a law practice and making friends; and he and Emily were quite happy in their great love. They found they could get along very well without the colonel's blessing, although they would have been glad to have had it.
