Inmate successfully objects to restitution

Anthony Craig Osborne

The two inmates who tried escaping from Clatsop County Jail last summer have each been on the hook to pay off more than $2,100 in restitution for the damage they caused.

Kevin Michael Burnham and Anthony Craig Osborne were accused of breaking off a shower drain grate, tying it to a bedsheet and swinging it against a window multiple times until the window shattered. Both are serving prison sentences related to the escape incident and other previous charges.

Osborne, 25, of Seaside, successfully argued in Clatsop County Circuit Court Friday, Feb. 26, that he should only have to pay for damage he caused to a smaller window a few days prior to the escape attempt. He claims he was not involved in damaging the larger window.

"That's what I was accused of, but I was never convicted," Osborne said via video link from prison.

Judge Philip Nelson agreed, and ruled that Osborne will be responsible for paying $673 for the smaller window. Burnham, 26, of Seaside, will be responsible for paying off the remaining restitution.

The $2,154.73 restitution amount covers the temporary and permanent fixes to the two windows involved.

Burnham pleaded guilty to first-degree attempted escape for the jail incident. Osborne pleaded no contest to first-degree criminal mischief.

During the escape attempt, the inmates flooded a toilet in a cellblock and added soap to make the floor slippery for any responding corrections officers.

Their plan was foiled once a corrections officer started hearing the muffled thumping sound of the grate hitting the window. A couple of more swings and the inmates could have broken through the window, which is large enough for them to climb out.

The officers detained the inmates and placed them in a more secure part of the jail.
