LIFE'S PILGRIM.

Like those who travel (?) toward through the day,
We journey on along Life's devious way;
Behind us each a Shadow hasteneth,
And suddenly ere we are quite aware,
Lo! at our side a presence mute is there
To be our fellow to the door of Death!
Darker the path each moment grows, and then
At last, the journey done, Night falls again,
And with the Shadow we lie down to rest
And slumber peacefully upon Earth's breast.

CAPTURED BICYCLE.

Percy Terrell began to realize the foolishness of his act in sallying forth all by himself.

The desert stretched on every hand until it was lost in the vast distance. The grassless, treeless hills seemed to heave to and fro under the hot sun like billows—a strange, spectral landscape.

The previous morning Percy had started out on his wheel from The Needles, a town near the California and Arizona line, intending to make the run to Barbazon in the desert, instead of waiting to take passage on the weekly stage. The distance was considerable, but he felt he ought to have no trouble in making it on his safety.

He had first fancied crossing the desert on a bicycle, and not all the dissuasions of his friends at The Needles had been sufficient to induce him to abandon the idea. He wished now he had paid some heed to what had been told him.

He had dismounted for a rest and was sitting on a gravelly hillock. He unslung his water bottle and took a short pull at it. The water was warm and disagreeable, and worst of all it was alarmingly low, and he had no knowledge of how soon he might get more. He had missed the only spring in that section, and for all he knew there might not be another on the entire Barbazon route. His progress had been slower than he had anticipated. The sand was so deep in places that wheeling was out of the question; so far the work had been extremely fatiguing instead of being an exhilarating exercise.

Soon he remounted and again set out in the direction indicated as the right one by the little pocket compass he had been thoughtful enough to take. He would have felt better if there had been any way to determine the distance yet to be traversed. He hoped he would not be forced to make another night camp in the desert.

As he set the wheels in motion he heard a singular clacking sound. Turning half around in the saddle, he saw three Indians rise from behind a low mound and come running toward him.

The sight almost took away Percy's breath. Although he knew at a glance they were Yumas and had been told that the Yumas were peaceably disposed, there was something in their bearing that filled him with fear. He felt even more nervous when he saw two others rise from another mound a short distance ahead and place themselves in a position to intercept him.

He could not doubt that they had stolen on him while he rested and were now trying to hem in and capture him. Why they should desire to do this he could not guess, but their actions did not look friendly.

The wheeling was fairly good at that point, and Percy sent the bicycle forward at a round gait and hoped he would elude or dash by the two Indians in front. As the bicycle obediently leaped ahead under the strong propulsion he began to feel sure he could do it.

He swerved to the right as he neared the two Indians, and when they rushed in that direction, too, he gave a quick turn and sent the safety spinning away on a new tack. Meanwhile the three in the rear were hurrying up with all their might and yelling in a manner to disconcert the bravest, and the two in front now added their wild cries to the hideous chorus.

"Yell away there, you red scoundrels!" Percy shouted as with a spurt he sped by, beginning to feel he would make an easy escape. "Yell away there and catch me if you can."

He had seen that none of them had firearms, carrying only long lances of hard wood and tipped with iron.

But he had boasted too soon. The Yuma nearest lifted his lance and hurled it through the air with marvelous force and skill. Percy glimpsed it shooting toward him, and with a cry of fear bent down to escape it.

The weapon had not been hurled at him, however. The wily Yuma had aimed at the forward spinning wheel of the safety. The blade of the lance passed between the spokes and downward into the sand, where it stood imbedded, the shaft between the spokes. One of the spokes had been broken and several others bent, and Percy had been pitched headlong over the wheel into the sand.

Before he could rise the Indian's hands held him in a vicelike grip.

Pleased grins rested on the ugly faces of the Yumas as they gathered around their captive and glanced from him to the injured bicycle.

"What do you want with me?" Percy demanded, struggling to a sitting posture and making a show of bravery. "Why did you wreck my safety that way? I'll have you punished for it."

The Indians chuckled with delight at his anger.

"Want to see um iron pony," one of them condescended to explain. "Injun want to ride um iron pony! Injun want um iron pony! Savvy? Um iron pony no eat, no drink, no git tired, no git sleepy. Make bully pony for pore Injun."

Light dawned on Percy. These Yumas wanted the bicycle for their own use. Perhaps they had seen him wheeling around The Needles on it. If so, they probably had dogged him all the way.

His spirit rose. He vowed he would thwart them. He saw that, though some of the spokes were ruined, the wheel was still strong enough to do good service.

He got up and stepped nearer, as if to inspect the damaged wheel. A heavy hand fell on his shoulder, and he was drawn rather roughly back.

"Injun ride um pony now! Mebbe little white boy git hurt! Savvy?"

Percy smiled against his will. Compared with these Yumas he had to confess he was a very "little white boy." All five were broad shouldered giants of fellows, with arms and legs like bronze beams and muscles that stood out in knotted rolls of strength.

The Indian who had grasped Percy's shoulder stepped up to the overturned bicycle, drew out the shaft of the lance and swung himself awkwardly into the seat. The safety toppled over with him as soon as he tried to set his moccasined feet on the pedals. A laugh greeted his failure, but a comrade came to his assistance, and the discomfited Yuma tried again.

He seemed to find it great fun to sit in the saddle and be wheeled about on the sand, but it was impossible for him to keep his seat and work the wheel without aid.

Another and another tried it, with no better success.

If the entire performance had not been so exasperating, Percy might have seen in it much to amuse him. It was really a most laughable exhibition of awkwardness. These Yumas would have had no trouble in mounting and riding the wildest pony that ever bounded across that desert, but here they found their skill at fault. What looked so easy proved to be entirely beyond them all.

Grunts of delight or derision arose at each failure, and when one of the fellows was shot head first into the sand and got up digging it out of his mouth and eyes and making a wry face the yells of his companions rose in an ecstatic chorus.

They spent more than an hour in an endeavor to conquer the "little white boy's" steed, but at the end of that time were forced to give it up as hopeless.

"Little iron pony heap buck," one of them explained, crossing over to where Percy reclined on the sand and pointing to the unmanageable safety. "White boy show Injun how to ride um."

This was an opportunity Percy had begun to fear would never come.

"Oh, ride it yourself," he said, with a show of scorn and indifference. "You'll learn soon."

But when the Yuma gravely shook his head and pointed once more to the bicycle Percy arose and walked toward it with assumed indifference, though he felt his limbs trembling under him.

He examined the injured wheel leisurely and saw that practically it was as good as if sound. Nevertheless he pointed to the twisted spokes as though the trouble the Yumas had experienced lay in them.

The Yumas were watching him, and with evident suspicion. Some of them took up their lances and stationed themselves near, plainly to prevent any effort to escape.

Percy mounted. At first he rode the bicycle round and round in a little circle, all the while causing it to wabble as if it were out of order. Under his indifference he was closely watching with a wildly beating heart for a chance to break past the line of lances and send his wheel spinning across the sand. Slowly he increased the circle, adding a yard or two to its diameter at every sweep. Suddenly seeing an opening he made a sharp, quick turn, and throwing all his strength into the rush made a dash for liberty.

A threatening yell arose behind, and several lance points whizzed past him, but the haste with which they were thrown caused them to fly wildly. None touched him, and in another moment the young bicyclist had spun well out beyond the yelling circle and was flying with all speed across the gravelly waste, the Yumas in pursuit.

Being splendid runners, the Indians crowded him uncomfortably close for the first 100 yards. At that point the earth became yet firmer, and with the advantage of this better roadway Percy rapidly increased the distance between himself and these very unpleasant acquaintances.

They hung persistently on the track, however, though at the end of half an hour they had dwindled to mere specks. At the expiration of an hour they were no longer visible, and then Percy threw himself on the sand, feeling that he could not propel the safety another yard if his life depended on it.

The Yumas did not come into view again, probably having abandoned the useless chase, and the next afternoon Percy reached Barbazon safe and sound. —John H. Whitson in New York Press.

A Delicate and Daring Operation.

The constant aim of surgery is to reduce the rate of mortality in certain dangerous operations and with this object experiment is going on all the while. These experiments are often continued for a long period of time upon the dead body before being once tried upon a living subject. This was the case with a new operation which was tried for the first time in this city. This operation is called symphyseotomy, and it is said to be hardly less dangerous than the one for which it was supposed to be a substitute. It was intended to take the place of the improved Cæsarian operation.

Symphyseotomy consists of splitting the bones of the pelvis. It was tried twice in Philadelphia since the first operation of the kind in this country, which took place in New York, and it was not followed by any disastrous result. In the record of all the cases here and in Europe since this operation was introduced the mortality is lower than the Cæsarian method, and it is hoped it may be perfected so as to dispense with the latter altogether.—New York Cor. St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

England's Nursery Grounds.

Nursery grounds in England covered in 1892 a total area of 11,331 acres—practically the same as in the preceding year. The largest county acreage is Surrey, with 1,733—more than double that of any other county, the next in order being the West Riding of Yorkshire, with 702 acres; Chester has 597 acres; Hertford, 509; Kent, 728; Middlesex, 694; Worcester, 220, and so on, till we come to Rutland, with 12, and Westmoreland, with 11 acres only.—Gardener's Chronicle.
