

Didn't Want Office.

The HEADLIGHT man was sauntering down the street the other day looking for stray items, when he was accosted by a defeated candidate thusly: "Say, come and take something."

The editor thought politics had died out and wondered what axe was to be ground now. He is strictly temperate, but thought he'd lay his principles aside this time, and see what was the matter. So the pair went into Hadley's gilded palace of sin and took a few drops of his elixir of life. Mr. Defeated Candidate then said:

"Well, the election is over, and I'm glad of it. I'm glad I was defeated. I didn't want it, and I could 'em so all the time."

Of course, the quill pusher coincided with him and started to saunter away, but D. F. followed along, explaining how it was. Just as the editor started to turn in at the Bakery to see Charley Hemstreet about some Epworth League business, the D. F. whispered "Let's go into Charley Smith's." Again they passed through the portals of temptation and looked at the glittering array of Satan's wares behind the bar. Mr. D. F. said to set out something, and the soft-handed, white-aproned gentleman behind the bar, with his hair parted in the middle, put out some aqua vitae, which was soon lost to view.

The man of pencils then started away, but was button-holed by the D. F., who gently led him to Lamb's book store. There he purchased some neatly rolled Havana weeds, and they retired to Lamb's back room.

The D. F. went on:

"No, I didn't want the office. I was in the hands of my friends, and I told all of them not to work for me. Of course, I'd been elected, if all my party had stood by me, but I'm better off the way it is. You see, I never went around nor spent any money. Oh! if I'd got out and worked a little I'd been elected just as easy as not. But I didn't want it."

The scribe acquiesced. The D. F. then became pathetic, and as the tears rolled down his cheeks he reiterated that "he didn't want the office." He pulled out a bandana handkerchief, mopped his manly brow and tried to smother his sobs, and during this performance quill man stole gently away, convinced that the D. F. did want the office.

Obituary.

DIED.—Mary Simmons, wife of E. T. Simmons, in Portland, June 13, 1894, aged 25 years.

Mrs. Simmons, nee Mary Williams, was well known in this place, having grown up here from childhood. She was born in Australia, but her parents moved to California while she was very young, and a little later to this county where they have resided since.

She was married November 26, 1892, to Mr. E. T. Simmons, a commission merchant of Portland, and resided there until her death. Her parents, one sister and several brothers survive her.

The remains were brought to this place for interment, and the funeral occurred Sunday, Rev. McLachlan conducting the funeral service, after which the body was laid to rest in I. O. O. F. cemetery.

The church was crowded during the services, and a very large procession of friends followed to the cemetery.

The bereaved husband and the relatives of the deceased, have the sympathy of the public, as Mrs. Simmons had many warm friends here, and was a general favorite among the young people here before she made her residence in Portland.

It is understood that H. F. Goodspeed will be our next deputy sheriff, and that Tom Coates will be deputy county clerk, as soon as the new officials take their seats.
