Memorial day, last Thursday, was celebrated appropriately in this place, the programme published previously was carried out, and the people turned out to do honor to the old veterans. At night the exercises in May academy were of the most excellent character, and every body remarked at the perfect manner in which the school children had been drilled. The recitations were all good, and the programme was not so long and tiresome as it has been on like occasions in years past. As the old soldiers grow older and fewer in number, it seems that patriotism increases, and even the little children seem to be imbued with a spirit of loyalty to their country and to those who so nobly defended it in its greatest peril.
