MORAL TRAINING—THE VITAL NEED IN Our Public Schools.

A paper read before the Tillamook Teachers Institute by M. ELINOR DUFFY.

Training, or character building, and instruction are the two vital needs of the public school. Of these, the most important is training—moral development; the formation of character.

The virtues of truthfulness, justice, honor, magnanimity, faithfulness, self-government, energy, economy, steady purpose, independence, individuality, and all the galaxy of virtues that make up the good citizen and build a great state—these, combined with a development of love for learning, need to be taught as the foundation of all education.

So have Pestalozzi, Herbart and Herbert Spencer all declared. It is said of Pestalozzi that he saw the real work of his life as an educator lay in "the training of the whole man." To that end, "he lived with his pupils, played, starred and suffered with them, and clung to their hearts and minds with an affectionate sympathy which revealed to him every minute difference of character and disposition." Herbart says: "The one and the whole work of education may be summed up in the concept—Morality." And it is said of him: "Herbart endeavors to insure that morality shall penetrate all parts of the mind and heart—that under a rightly directed, all-embracing, education, the whole of the character, not merely one side of it, shall be permeated and impelled by moral force."

This training and development constitute the most vital part of education. It is especially true of the arabs, the hoodlums, the waifs, from whose ranks must needs come most of the crime and disorder that undermine society and government. Unless these receive special attention and impression in character building, their environments will lead them in an opposite direction. So, instead of expulsion from school, as is the prevailing method, these poor unfortunate should be held out with such a tenacity and true sympathy as would compel their reformation.

The responsibility assumed by the true teacher is boundless. Under it a teacher has a high standard of duty. She gets acquainted with each individual pupil; enters his life; learns its nature; becomes the second mother. She makes this knowledge the first step in her teaching. It is the vital feature—the foundation of character building, the basis of manhood and womanhood. She studies the boy more than the book. Each pupil is a book of problems and from this book she learns just what is needed to instill in each child an eager desire to learn.

She studies the child's physical needs, watches over his health with maternal solicitude; invokes all the accessories of sunshine, fresh air and cleanliness, and makes his surroundings as pleasant as may be.

In all these efforts she treats the mother as her most powerful ally. In thus managing the child, she endears him to herself and wins his confidence and respect. He is then easily led, with a glad spirit, up to the fountains of knowledge. Ah! the teacher of this true education handles the pupils under her charge as the most sacred and delicate trust that can be undertaken by a human being! In case of the lowly or ignorant, she specially looks into the home surroundings, and insofar as she can she aids the mother in promoting better hygienic conditions. Whenever advice from her will better fit a child for physical and mental growth her watchful mind sees the situation and suggests the remedy. To this extent, and this only, she enters into the home life and arouses the parents to a livelier interest in their children. In this way she develops to the highest degree these agencies of education.

It needs no savant to foretell that, with the teacher and mother both intensely interested in the moral and mental development of all children in the public schools, results on the grandest scale must follow. The arab will be reformed; the idle become attentive; the dull will brighten, unabatingly the grand procession will evolve into self-governing beings—self-respecting men and women. The schoolroom can thus be made dear; yes, far dearer to the little arabs and oncewhile hoodlums, than their homes, and the lessons learned will never leave them. Such a schoolroom is a doorway to good citizenship. It is the deadly foe of the prison house.

I knew a teacher once who taught a public school in a tough quarter of one of our largest cities. Most of the patrons were poor. The school was noted for its hard cases. She found, in the main, a dirty, careless lot of arabs given over to fighting, quarreling, lying and stealing, profanity and truancy. She applied the principles of true education to her pupils. At the end of one year, they were a self-respecting lot of little men and women, clean and tidy, freed from naughtiness and filled with an eager desire to learn and animate with the belief that their acquisition of education was of supreme importance.

Let me present a couple of pictures from that little land, showing the operation of that vital principal of special study and treatment of each child. Little David was very bright, but so wildly nervous he could not concentrate his full powers upon his studies. He was seated with good results, in the midst of a group of calm and studious pupils. The school was told that certain different treatment was to be used with him on account of his nervousness. Still he dropped. Persistence disclosed, that he slept with an older brother, with a co-sleeping loss of vitality. This was remedied; his cheeks became rosy his complexion clear. Soon his entire energies were concentrated upon his studies, with astonishing results. His school, his teacher, his studies fitted his life, and his mother, sharing in his pursuits, saw steady and rapid development never before displayed. David was of opulent surroundings, and grew rapidly into a noble little manhood.

Little Albert was a poor boy; a hunch back; very delicate, very bright, but naughty; cursed and fought and told falsehoods; and was easily led astray by other bad boys. The teacher took hold of him with a firm, but kind grasp. His sympathies were enlisted through his afflictions. His better nature was aroused. His love for his mother was invoked. His seat and desk were adjusted to suit his poor little frame. When his face grew pale and pinched, he was placed on a pallet by the fire. The school noises hushed as by common consent while he slept for a half hour. He was won to study. His naughtiness disappeared. He dreamed of a career in life. The picture of the little arab, toiling eagerly over his books, under the fostering care of his teacher was an objective lesson in moral character of the highest value to the entire class. Little Albert, clean and tidy, forged ahead rapidly; a model in conduct and scholarship to all.

Syrup Bath.

The usual noonday throng in River street was treated to a very unusual and ludicrous sight at 1 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

A large barrel of maple sugar fell from the wagon of the Mannerre & Yoc Syrup Company to the pavement in front of 32 River street, where it broke at the feet of a young man.

The sticky fluid instantly surrounded the unfortunate man, who in his endeavors to jump out of the small lake of syrup fell flat on his face in the saccharine fluid. Slowly raising to his feet, his clothing and features saturated with the glutinous treacle, he again made an attempt to change his surroundings, but with no better success. By this time quite a crowd had been attracted by the fruitless endeavors of the young man to make his escape. Finally a long pole, and pulled him out of the pond of syrup.

The sugar coated man made his way to the nearest clothier's and procured himself a new outfit, while two industrious porters removed all traces of the mishap from the street.

Oregon Notes.

Hon. W. M. Ramsey, of McMinnville Ore., has just received some trophies of the late Santiago Naval battle, sent to him by his son, who was in the battle. They were taken from the Cristobal Colon and include a silver sugar-bowl and teapot, a pair of silk plush throws, and an elaborate silk curtain. They are displayed in a local store at McMinnville and are viewed by many curious people.

The body of a babe was found buried near Salem Sunday. Corner Clough made an investigation, and concluded that no crime had been committed. It is probable that the child belonged to poor people and that the best burial they could give it was to wrap it in a clean shroud and find a grave for which they did not have to pay.

A chin man at La Grande drank a bottle of black ink with suicidal intent a few days ago. He did not die but his month looks like he had eaten huckle berry pie since the time of Adam.

The flouring mill and elevator at La Fayette Ore., were destroyed by fire Aug. 16. The loss was $23,000.

Wasco has a new flouring mill.
