BRITAIN'S POPULAR BANKS.

Seven Million Depositors and $600,000,000 of Funds—Benefits Accruing to the Nation and the People.

The laying of the cornerstone of one of the British Postoffice Savings bank was a series of buildings, which will occupy five acres of ground in London, for the use of properly made an occasion of national congratulation. No other institution has been as great a power in promoting thrift in the empire, and its enormous transactions furnish abundant proof of its popularity. There are 7,000,000 depositors on the rolls of the bank and its branches and its funds aggregate $600,000,000.

"No financial institution in all history," writes a correspondent to the New York Sun, "has enjoyed so marvelous a growth as the British Postoffice Savings bank. It was founded only thirty-eight years ago. So quickly did it win the confidence of the public that a separate building for the accommodation of its headquarters staff soon became necessary. Extensions and additions which have since been made have been fully occupied as fast as complete until no further accommodations near the general postoffice were possible without expenditure out of all proportion to the ends required. The growth has been so rapid that more than 100 clerks had been added to the staff each year for more than ten years past. It is obvious, after a moment's thought that there is good reason for maintaining the headquarters of the bank in the heart of London.

Differs from Ordinary Banks.

The Postoffice Savings bank is not a bank where current accounts are kept. There is no payment of checks over the counter, no customer can enter into any confidential relations with the bank—in fact there is no bank management in the ordinary sense of the term. For the receipt of money the bank has an office in every town and village in the kingdom; there are now over 12,000. The withdrawal of money is a business affair and must be conducted by correspondence, consequently the direct relations of that office is to keep accounts, for it has been a distinguished feature of the bank from the first that all accounts should be kept in London and every payment made from there, to issue warrants for repayment of deposits and to conduct a voluminous correspondence.

The duke of Norfolk, the present postmaster general, secured the broad tract of land covered for the most part with church buildings, adjoining the Olympia show, Bannum & Bailey's headquarters at West Kensington. The location is rather less than four miles from Charing Cross, and is of course, the most distant of that of any departmental government buildings.

It is worth while to outline briefly from the reviews of the work of this remarkable institution published today the principal features of its growth. The point which will most forcibly impress the American mind is the fact that first 3 per cent and during recent years 2½ per cent interest has been sufficient inducement to draw the pennies and shillings of all classes in a fabulous aggregate to the coffers of the government.

Growth of the Business.

The bank opened its doors in September 1861, and at the end of 1862 it had 180,000 accounts, amounting to $8,750,000. In five years from 1863 to 1868 the total sum deposited stood on the average at £7,000,000, in the succeeding five years at £18,000,000 and from 1875 to 1880 at £29,000,000. Then came Mr. Fawcett's regime at the postoffice. The savings bank appealed to him as an institution which helped the laboring classes to help themselves, and he became its apostle. He brought the bank within the reach of the children by providing the penny stamp slip, and thus enabling the school boy to make up the minimum deposit of a shilling by pennies put by from time to time. At the other end of the scale he enabled the depositor who was approaching the maximum to buy consols through the bank and thus to recommence his deposits of cash. And by his power of popular exposition he made all who were interested in practicing or encouraging thrift familiar with the advantages of the bank. The result soon became apparent in the accounts. The deposits rose to an average of $42,000,000 between 1881 and 1885, and in 1890 they had risen to $67,000,000.

But during the last decade the business of the banks has perhaps made the most gigantic strides, for at the end of 1897 the deposits reached the astonishing sum of nearly £116,000,000, and by this time they have doubtless exceed £120,000,000. In an old report of postmaster general's there is a forecast that for some time the annual increase in the savings bank business would be from 130,000 to 140,000 in the number of deposits. Between 1896 and 1897 the numbers of depositors increased by 577,000 and the amount deposited by nearly £8,000,000. The vast sum held by the bank is made up by a great multitude of small savings; there are more than 7,000,000 of depositors and the average sum standing to their account only slightly exceeds £16. One in every five persons in England and Wales has an account in the bank. In Scotland the bank has never been so popular, not because the population is less thrifty, but because the ordinary banks invite the deposit of small sums; both there and in Ireland one in every fourteen persons is a depositor.

Widepread Uses.

It is not only taking care of the savings of the individual that the Postoffice assist thrift. It is the banker of friendly societies, penny banks and small charitable funds of all sorts. It is used by the war office for the savings of soldiers abroad and for the deposit of deferred pay, while the Technical Education Board of the London County Council pays its scholarships through the books of the bank. When school pence were abolished the Postoffice and the education department co-operated in an attempt to capture for the benefit of the children the small sums previously paid for their education and it is estimated that £40,000 was deposited through elementary schools in the first year after the change. Nor has the bank destroyed the older agencies for the encouragement of thrift, the trustees savings banks. Very many of the smaller banks have been closed, and this is not to be regretted as the difficulties of voluntary management not infrequently lead to disasters. But the larger and sounder banks are in a better condition today than they ever have been and the total sum deposited in the trustee banks exceeds by several millions the amount which they held when the Postoffice entered the field in 1861. Nor have all the benefits conferred by this great agency for thrift entailed any loss upon the nation. Though at the present moment there are a slight deficiency on the working of the bank, owing to the limited range of investments allowed to it and the high price of consols the national exchequer has in the past benefited to the extent of a million and a half by the savings entrusted to the Postoffice.
