Taking no Chances.

Somehow she felt that he had come with his mind made up to propose, says London Tit-Bits. She was as certain of it as she would have been had he told her, and consequently she amused herself by teasing him for half an hour before she let him have a chance to come to the point.

And then he talked.

She couldn't understand it. She knew that he was on the verge of asking her to be his wife, but he didn't put the question. He became suddenly very ill at ease and nervous, and sheered off every time they got anywhere near the subject that was uppermost in the mind of each.

She looked at him soulfully, and he returned the look, but that was as far as he went. She sighed and he sighed, but he didn't put his hopes and wishes into words. She became pensive and romantic, and talked of the loneliness of a woman or a girl who had no strong arm to lean upon as she walked through life, but it did not bring any avowal from his lips.

She feared that she had played with him too long, and he, possibly, lost him, but at last he spoke.

"Shall we go out into the garden?" he asked.

She knew, although he did not, that there were others in the garden, and pleaded that she was afraid of the night air.

He looked about the room anxiously, but seemed to find nothing that gave any hope. He seemed to be despondent, but in a measure determined.

"Mable," he said at last, speaking very softly.

"Yes," she returned, endeavoring not to show her agitation.

"There is some thing I wish very much to say to you."

She looked down at the toe of her boot and said nothing.

He came over to her and took her hand.

"Mable," he said earnestly, "if you will take a moment's time to listen to me, I'll tell you what it is."

Then she understood why he had been so nervous, and the parrot was put where he could not overhear and repeat what might be said.

Featherstone—Come Bobbie (handing him a quarter), how many fellows have called upon your sister this week.

Bobbie—Let's see—five.

"That doesn't include me, does it?"

"Oh, no. Sister says you don't court."
