SUGAR'S VALUE AS FOOD.

Recent Tests by German Experts Give Affirmative Results.

German scientists have recently been conducting experiments to acertain how far it is safe for people to employ sugar as an article of diet. These inquiries are not altogether disinterested, says the New York Tribune. Quite the contrary. Two-thirds of the world's supply of sugar is made from beets, and more than one-third of the total production of beet sugar is credited to Germany. Part of this amount she is able to sell to foreigners. But the greater part of it she consumes herself. Now, exportation is liable to fall off at any time, and it is highly probable that the manufacture will continue to increase. Hence it is desirable, from the German point of view to promote the use of sugar as far as possible. However, this motive does not impair the value of the investigations recently made. Instead, it imparts greater interest to the latter.

It is a rather curious fact that although Germany makes an enormous quantity of sugar, her people are not the largest consumers of that commodity. Statistics for 1897 show that in England the average amount consumed per capita was 85.7 pounds a year, whereas in Germany only 26.6 pounds were eaten. Americans ate on an average 62.3 pounds. Hence it would be practicable to double or even treble the consumption in Germany without any appearance of excessive indulgence.

Still, before recommending a policy of this sort, it was deemed wise by the experts to institute elaborate tests of the effect of a sugar diet. The result was highly encouraging. It has been determined that a liberal use of sugar is strengthening and fattening. One is taken aback for a moment by the discovery that the latter virtue was demonstrated by experiments with hogs and cattle; but this is a situation calling for cold logic, not sentiment.

Even before the tests were made which the American consul at Magdeburg reports to the State department at Washington, it was known that mountain climbers regard sugar as a source of energy. Moreover, the chemists say that, "it is a soluble carbon hydrate that is easily converted into warmth and force." That ought to settle the question. But the virdict was not considered final. Your German scientists want to measure and compute, and enable himself to state his conclusions in a mathematical form. He is still happier if he can employ a substantial piece of apparatus in his inquiry.

Well, these German servants proceeded in the following manner: They requested a man to apply his finger to a device called an ergostat, or force measurer. He exerted himself to the utmost to move the index of the machine. A record of his strength was made. On a different occasion he was fed on sugar and again experimented with. It then appeared that he could make a better showing with the ergostat than before. Another form of the trial was to let a man tire himself out, feed him with sugar and see if it restored his strength more quickly than abstinence. It thus appeared that his weary muscles recovered their power promptly in consequence of eating sugar.

The German government is said to be considering the expediency of adding six lumps of sugar to each soldier's ration in the army. But, whatever it decides, it seems to have been demonstrated that the matinee girl who eats a pound of bonbons during the performance of a play will be able to reach home in a much less exhausted condition than would otherwise be possible.

Connubialities.

Some maiden ladies in Newark, N. J., refused to tell the census enumerator their ages or even their names, because they believe the taking of the census is for the purpose of getting the names of all single women in the country and fining them $100 for not having husbands.

Miss Elizabeth Smith, a society girl of Derby, Conn., and the possessor of $40,000, is going to marry a mechanic in a type-writer factory, who earns $12 a week. She has turned a deaf ear to many fashionable young men who have paid court to her on the golf links and in the ball room.

At a wedding in Illinois the other day no men except the bridegroom and the minister were allowed. Even the ushers were women, and so was the "best man." It needed only a woman minister to make the femininity of the occasion complete. And then what a pity the bridegroom had to be a man!

George Clark Musgrave, who was married at New York a few days ago, served under the British flag in the Ashantee campaign, fought with the Cubans under Garcia, then served under the American flag in Cuba and has just returned from the Transvaal, where he was with the England colonial scouts.

Two hundred wedding guests assembled at the home of Mrs. M. A. Wildey, 6436 Eggleston avenue, Chicago, to witness the marriage between her son, Arthur D. Wildey, and Miss Blanche C. Dean. The bride and bridegroom were present at the appointed hour, 5:30 o'clock, but the minister failed to appear. The guests waited patiently until an hour had passed, when it was announced that the wedding had occurred the night previous, and that the guest had nothing to do but to enjoy the wedding feast. The young couple had planned a secret and romantic marriage, but acceded to the wish of the bridegroom's relatives for a public wedding. News of the illness of the bride's mother on Tuesday made this distasteful to her and the couple concluded to be married that night, as originally planned.

G. H. Childs, the young man from Boston, who married Miss Margaret Harrison, daughter of L. B. Harrison, president of the First National bank, Cincinnati, was made a butt for an hour in the health office one day last week. Will Kittredge and some of the local swells, including a group from "down east," who came with the prospective bridegroom, informed Childs that he could not get a license to marry in Cincinnati without a certificate of good health. He agreed to undergo a test and they took him before Health Officer Davis to be examined. The latter was let into the joke. As Childs danced about the health office first on one foot and then on the other, his companions almost choked in an attempt to smother their laughter. Childs was made to jump over chairs, roll about on the floor and do other gymnastic feats. After being tested for mental capabilities Mr. Childs was officially pronounced in a first class condition of health.
