The September number of Lippincott's is fiction full. Its opening novelette, "The Fortress," comes from the pen of an exwar correspondent, Will Levington Comfort, who tells a tale of love amid sterring scenes around Port Arthur. An American girl, reporter for a metropolitan newspaper, shares the story's stage centre with two American men and a Russian captain. The girl-one of the pluckiest and prettiest of her sex-suc ceeds in entering Port Arthur just before the harbor is closed. Her experiences there, while her lover is moving heaven and earth to effect her release; the vital, but not long-drawn-out, war scenes; the escape and jubilant return to the metropolis with a splendid "scoop" for her paper, make an unforgettable story. which the author may be proud to have produced In the confusion incident to a girl's short of money, a would-be lover grasps the opportunity to ingratiate himself. This is naturally and spiritedly told by Francis Lynde in his story. "A Fellow Feeling Kinship." Burglary up to date supplies the theme for a tale by Ina Brevoort Roberts called "The Burglar and the Lady." Aldridge Evelyn is a new name in magazine fiction and, judging by his contribution, "A Two-Sided Honeymoon," he has come to stay. A country story abounding in humor is 'How William Got His Fling," by Ella Middleton Tybout. An Irishman's clever trick in the contracting business is divulged by Birdsall Jackson in his sketch entitltd "Monahan's Incropehment." 'The Justification of Cap'n Orrin,' by William Foster Brown, strikes a terperance note in an amusing way. 'Jacko's Angel,' a pathetic tale of a little bootblack and a musician, is placed at Atlantic City, and seems peculiarly timely in view of the furore created this season by a certain band-master. Its author is Jean Pardee-Clark. Alfred Stoddart does good work in his sporting stories, and the one called "How Jones Got His Revenge 'seems likely to boost his reputation,
