TILLAMOOK COUNTY'S FIRST WHITE SETTLER.

J. C. Champion Came Here in a Fish Boat from Astoria in 1851.

Coroner C. E. Reynolds has circulated a subscription list to raise funds to place a monument over the grave of Joseph C. Champion, the first white settler in Tillamook county, who came here in a fish boat in April, 1851, and died on the 23rd August, 1891, and was buried the next day in the Oddfellows' cemetery. He was the first county clerk of Tillamook and was the first person to teach school in the county.

There was some doubt as to the date of Champion's death, and going over the files of the Headlight, Coroner Reynolds cleared up this by finding an account of his death, the date of which is given above. As Mr. Reynolds was in the undertaker's business at the time, he buried Champion in the Oddfellows' cemetery.

(From the Headlight, Aug. 27, 1891.)
J. C. Champion died Sunday at the residence of W. S. Kimball.

He was a native of England and was born in 1823, coming to America while yet a young man. He landed in Boston where he remained awhile, and afterwards made trips back to England and around the world as a sailor. He lived for a time in San Francisco and at one time in Philadelphia, where several of his relatives reside at the present time. But most of his days were spent on the Pacific Coast.

In 1851 he left Astoria in a small boat with two men, Sam Howard and W. Taylor, for Tillamook, a country which he had heard spoken of by Indian trappers. They found considerable difficulty in making an entrance into Tillamook Bay, not being acquainted with the bar, but after lying outside over night entered safely with their small craft. They made a landing near Kilchis point, and were hospitably received by the Indians, but Taylor and Howard became discouraged and returned to Astoria immediately, leaving "Joe," as he was commonly known, with the Indians.

He lived in various places in the neighborhood, and at one time resided in a hollow tree.

He left in a few months, however, but returned later, and though absent at one time for a short period after this, is entitled to the distinction of being the first white settler in Tillamook. It is claimed that another man was here prior to his coming, but there is no authentic record of it. Other settlers came, and Joe was a great favorite among them, being acquainted with the Indians was able to secure many favors from them.

He was a highly educated man and held the office of County Clerk at one time. Of late years he has been prostrate with disease, and has been a county charge, but he always bore his sufferings with fortitude.

The funeral occurred on Monday, T. B. Handley making an appropriate oration at the grave.

(From the Special Edition of the Headlight, August, 1899.)
Joseph C. Champion was Tillamook's first white settler, and a brief history of this adventurous individual will not be out of place in this edition to show of what sterling stuff the pioneers were made.

Joseph C. Champion was born and raised in Pennsylvania, received a common school education, such as the district schools afford at that time, and when still quite a young man was imbued with a spirit of adventure. With a wild and restless spirit to see the Great West, he was not slow to catch the "Fever" which allured so many of the Argonauts to the Pacific slopesoon after the news reached the Eastern states that gold had been found in California in fabulous quantities. He set sail for California, and reached San Francisco, it is thought, in the fall of 1849, and some time in 1850 found him clerking in a small country store in San Rafael, Marin county, Cal. This work proving un congenial to his roving disposition, he soon abandoned it and set sail for Oregon, landing in Astoria some time in the fall of the same year.

After living a few months in Astoria, reports reached him from Indian sources that there was a beautiful country with rich and verdant prairies lying to the south of Clatsop, called Tillamook. Thither Champion resolved to go. Buying himself a whale boat he provisioned it for a six months' voyage, and with a spirit born of adventure he resolved to risk on the Pacific ocean, in a small open boat, his chances of ever seeing Tillamook, hiring two adventurous spirits like himself, Sam Howard and W. Taylor, to take him to Tillamook. Of these two men and their subsequent history, Champion has left a meagre account.

About the first day of April, 1851, Champion and his companions "manned" their boat and glided down the Columbia on a strong ebb tide. Crossing the Columbia bar they shaped their course southward, and by sunset of the same day reached Tillamook bar. Being unfamiliar with the entrance, they resolved to "lay to" until the next day, when they crossed in about ten o'clock, some Indians piloting them to Kilchis point, landing them at a place known by the early settlers as the "ship yard." Here the Indians showed Champion an old hollow, dead spruce tree in which to live. He and his companions soon conveyed the stores ashore, and the next day Howard and Taylor started back for Astoria with the boat. Champion named his hollow spruce tree "My Castle," and proceeded to make himself as comfortable as his environment would allow. But now occurred a scene that was to test his nerve and calibre. The Indians finding him alone commenced to show acts of hostility. One old Indian spat in his face, while several others had gathered up clubs to beat him. During the melee an Indian by the name of Adam, a prominent man in his tribe, and kind of a quasi chief, rushed in to the rescue and protected Champion from further violence. After this occurrence the Indians seemed to take it as the inevitable that the white, or Boston man, would come, and seemed pleased rather than otherwise that he would settle in their midst.

That summer and winter was passed without incident to Champion. He had succeeded in ingratiating himself into the good graces of Kilchis, the Indian chief. After that the white men had nothing to fear from the Tillamook Indians, even after the Indian war had commenced in Oregon. Old Kilchis was a staunch friend to the white man in all their hardships and trials in pioneer days.

Sam Howard and Alfred Cook returned the next spring with the same boat and assisted Champion to build his house. Champion and Howard lived together until the following August, when Champion sold his claim to Howard and started to California on a pleasure trip. Returning, after an absence of one year, he located on what is now known as the Nails place on Trask river. He soon abandoned that and settled on the claim owned by Mr. Thayer, which he sold to a Dr. Elmer. After that he went to the Sandwich Islands, being absent about three years. Shortly after his return he was elected county clerk.

He taught the first school in Tillamook county. In 1860, we find he made a public record of his advent into Tillamook county, a copy of which we have taken from the county's archives, which is as follows:

"A brief account of the settlement of Tillamook by the first settler, Jo. C. Champion.

"On the first day of April, A.D., 1851, I left the Columbia in a whale boat with provisions for six months, the crew consisting of Samuel Howard, W. Taylor and myself. We being unacquainted with the entrance to the bay, did not venture to enter the same day, as it was sunset when we arrived at the bar, but the next morning, at about 10 a.m., we went safely in and followed a canoe to the landing now called the ship yard. The Indians generally seemed pleased with the prospect of having the whites to settle among them—poor fools. They showed me a large hollow dead spruce tree, into which we conveyed all my property and christened it "My Castle."

The next day Howard and Taylor returned with the boat to Clatsop. About the 20th of May, Howard and Alfred Cook came here in the boat. They helped me put up my house—where Peter Morgan now lives (1860). Cook then left and Howard and myself remained together about the 20th of August, when I started for California. Shortly after I left Cook and H. Wilson came here. Cook took the claim that Vaughn has at present, and Wilson took to one that Jas. Higginbotham has. In the spring of '52 Nathan Dougherty came here with his family. His wife was the first white woman who had seen Tillamook—and up to this date the only white woman who has died here. A few months after Dougherty came, Trask and his family, came and settled on the claim they now reside on."

It will be seen that one account says he was born in England, while the other says he is born in Pennsylvania. The latter was, no doubt, a mistake, caused by a brother and sisters living in that state. As the account of his death gives England as his birthplace, this must be taken as correct in preference to the subsequent article we published, and we must admit that it was a "Bloomington" Englishman who was the first white settler of Tillamook County, but no matter what his nationality, he is certainly deserving of a monument so that future generations may know the resting place of Joseph C. Champion, the sunset when we arrived at the bay, did not venture to enter the same day, as it was first pioneer of Tillamook County.

The swiftest line of China and Japan ware that ever came to Tillamook was received at Mason Bro.'s.

The Coastward Trend.

It is worth one's while to carefully note the trend of all manner of investment, trade and settlement toward the coast of Oregon. The railroads and plains have been the Mecca of the man with money and energy during the years that have gone and the coast country has been held to be uninviting and profitless. Now the situation is reversed and the footsteps of the builder, homeseeker and prospector are found bearing toward the ocean side and as they diminish the mighty forests that hang upon the walls of mountains that bank against the sea.

Clatsop, Tillamook, Coos, are among the principal objectives of the new development and the pressure grows stronger, more plainly perceptible, day by day. It is not realized in the empire that lies to the eastward of the Coast Range, but we of the slope see it with glad eyes and count it among tremendous assets of the district and the day. The value of it lies in the largest of returns we are able to make to those who are here for real compensation. We have all they are seeking in illimitable quantities, and as this becomes better known the greater and richer will be the flood of appreciative immigration.

Keep your eyes on the coast county of Oregon, "for of such is the Kingdom of the future."—Astorian.
