Fiction For The Young.

TO THE EDITOR TILLAMOOK HEADLIGHT.

We often hear teachers and clergymen deploring the great quantities of trashy literature, as they term it, which are devoured by the youth of the country. The so called trash consists almost entirely of fiction which is made the scape-goat of all literary sins. Respectable dulness, whether it be of the historic, didactic, theologic, or scientific breed, browses at peace in the pastures of orthodox and pedagogic consideration, while lively fiction, one of the most talented, original, interesting, and—were it known—useful members of the flock, is loaded with reproaches and hunted to the woods. Fiction is made a vicarious sacrifice to the sins of inappreciable dullness and superstitious depravety.

Fiction is at once the nurse and offspring of the imagination, and the highest function of active intelligence. Reasoning, if natural, is mainly accurate imagination; if artificial, it is but a crippled faculty, hobbling on the crutches of a pair of premises which may be as false as a rotton stick.

By fiction the mind obtains glimpses of life and manners, and accumulates a stock of information not to be gained in any other way. Even the vicious yellow-covered literature of forty years ago gave its readers an insight into a phase of English history which the genius of Maculay could not make equally clear. Sneer at them as we may, our dime novels, too, give views of American life and history, and geography, which go far to rekindle in the youthful mind the enthusiasm which bad teachers and bad text-book too often conspire to extinguish. Indeed, what is history after all but desiccated fiction?

Fiction is the product not of the highest scholarship, but of the highest art in literature. It may be said that the pictures of fiction are not correct likenesses. But there is no such thing as a perfect representation of any thing. We must choose between form and color in art, and between grouping and prolixity in literature. The pictures of fiction are as true as any other pictures. Indeed true fiction and false history are more common than the reverse.

We have heard of clergymen inveighing against the literature of the imagination, whose every sentence in its dryness, barrenness, and baldness proclaimed that he had never ventured to diverge from the hard and dusty road of solid reading. No fairy tale eyer delighted his childhood, or war story animated his boyhood, no romance inspired his youth. It is needless to say that his hearers were few and dissatisfied and his salary was small. We have read of a scholar, the alumnus of many "institutions," the possessor of a pile of framed degrees and diplomas as high as a Virginia rail fence, who knew nothing of what is most needed to make one's self agreeable to the people we meet daily. He severely criticised the mounting of a play because Henry VIII was dressed in bright colored garments, expecting to see him appear in a silk hat and tongued boots. He never read a novel in his life, and from such authentic historians as he had consulted, trifles like manners, costumes, and the thous-and-and-one things that go to make up the daily life we live, were religiously omitted.

Then give children a chance to learn a little of what will make them vivacious and intelligent in society. We owe it to the world we live in to do more than make a living in it. Study may be the business of the mind during school years, but fiction should be its pleasure, as active sports are the need of the body. If study is continued to the age of eighteen or twenty, even vicious books do little injury. The literary taste improves with the advance of time, and the love of sensational works is as sure to die out as the milk-teeth are sure to be shed at the proper season. There is time for all kinds of fiction, Mother Goose, Jack and the Bean Stalk, The Arabian Nights, Blood and Thunder Adventures, Reid, Cooper, love stories and character stories, and the picture of the more common aspects of social life. All are good and improving at successive stages of mental growth. That the taste of some never rises above low water-mark on the scale of literature, is discreditable not to fiction, but to the particular minds that do not have in them to become enlarged.

It is quite an effort to read a book through. To cultivate a taste for reading is an object in education. Nothing so gradually and pleasantly develops this taste as the pursuit of fiction. Each tale or romance is a golden thread that draws us on till we are habitual readers before we are aware of our acquisition. The day in which a boy has finished his first two-volume book is a white day for him. It is not well in a laudable occupation to turn the task into a pleasure and the pleasure into a passion?

There is one species of fiction, however, which we consider unwholesome. It is such as the shelves of many Sabbath school libraries groan under. It is neither fiction nor fact, but simple foolishness. The object of its writers being not to write an artistic story, but to convey a ... doing one thing while pretending another—the effect is bad being to d... formance is not honest. The cause the ... discovers the cheat, and is under soon ... in taste or morals. Such ... improve... sugar coated pills—the moral ... are su... and the story the sugar-coating the pill, ... coating. But what healthy youth want is not medicine but food.
