A Cabinet Face Reader.

A Democratic contemporary feels certain that Mr. Wilson will select his own cabinet. It reasons that "The man who can look at the facial contours of Woodrow Wilson and then try and make his cabinet for him has a mighty poor appreciation of the value of his own time." Physiognomy is an interesting science these days, but the Democratic party may not be one of its expert interpreters. In fifty years it has had but one president, and his facial contours failed to keep him in satisfactory relations with his party or with the prosperity of the country. Mr. Cleveland had a firm set jaw and general squareness of visage. He was altogether too obstinate for the party on the honest value of the dollar. The party dropped him, facial contours and all, on the silver question and tariff pledges, the main issues at the time. Yet there are many who have some inkling of Lavater, as well as native powers of observation, who would call the Cleveland profile and front face more promising than those of the president elect.

Mr. Wilson has an ample chin with jaws to correspond, a nose sufficiently pronounced if not Wellingtonian, and small eyes that twinkle with a cryptic smile when he shakes hands with an enthusiastic caller. His teeth are on a condensed curve, but full in number, and no doubt of average power when they snap. Col. Watterson looked him over last spring and said he would never do. But the colonel is not infallible. He declared that Mr. Bryan would never do in 1896 and shouted for him in 1900. But Democratic politics are queer. Mr. Bryan was defeated every time, although every time his vote was much larger than Wilson's. Where is the line of luck in the facial map? Mr. Bryan has the widest smile and endowment of cheek. His tenacity of purpose is beyond dispute. If he fails three times of election as president he can personally select a president and then try again on his own account. There is a missing link in Mr. Wilson's facial contours. They have not yet been tried in Washington in any capacity.
