If Gov. Blease of South Carolina is seeking the talisman of Senator Tillman's political power in that state, the senator himself may have given him the tip. Returning to Washington from a long sojourn at home, Senator Tillman says that, home, Senator Tillman says that, during his vacation, he ate little else than hog's jowl and greens. The greens are called collards in the South Carolina vernacular, but collards are nothing else than greens such as are eaten with hog's jowl in other parts of the country, .It is worth Blease's trying. Neither the jowl nor the green can give all there is in Tillman, of force and effectiveness, but it is possible that a great many South Carolinans who never heard Tillman speak at all have steadily voted fo. him because he has long advertised his liking for hog's jowl and greens above Newburg's lobster and combination salad.

When Mr. Ford announced his profit sharing scheme and his minimum wage scale he doubtless felt that he was doing a fine thing. The advertising in the transaction was only incidental and it is not likely that he gave this feature a second thought. The only beneficial effect he expected, so far as his products were concerned, was higher efficiency and greater enthusiasm among his employes. But one criticism after another has followed his action. His plant was surrounded by unsuccessful applicants for positions and when the word was sent out that no more could be employed, the disappointed, in disregard of all logic and justice, threw things at his plant, causing some wreck. Because he had adopted an almost unprecedented plan of generousity, the unreasoning felt that he was somehow to blame because they could not share in the blessings.
