One hundred women in Pike County, Ky., have been indicted on a charge of selling their votes, at a school election. An indictment is of course, not a conviction of guilt, but there is such strong presumptive evidence in this case, in the number of indictments brought that some of the accused have actually let their palms be crossed with the price of a vote, that those advocates of women suffrage who have maintained that it would purify elections must reel under the blow. The further statement is made that the Kentucky women sold their votes at $1 apiece, only half as much as the indicted men charged and were paid for voting in the same way. Certain second-class hotels in San Francisco have doubled their charges being unfamiliar with the story of the man who killed the goose that laid golden eggs. The young man who has discovered that the mock marriage in which he was bridegroom is binding, doubtless wishes that he lived in some other state than New York. The closing of the exchanges on Washington's birthday deprived the gamblers of opportunity to make something out of the Evelyn episode.
