

Uncle Silas Says.

Amos, I want to live to see you develop within yourself the best qualities of human nature. First of all I would have you honest and fair in all your dealings, which you cannot be if you cultivate a covetous disposition. To be just and fair one should, from impulse alone, be able to view every business transaction from the standpoint of those with whom he is dealing as well as from that of his own, and thus find a medium between the extremes, a compromise that will be just to both. I would have you generous also, not to a fault, but within reason; still, I would rather have you prone to give away more than you should for your own welfare and have but little property, than be rich and miserly. I would also have you both moral and temperate, for without the possessions and practice of these virtues, life is not worth living. The old saying: "Life is just what you make it is just as true today as it was when it was first uttered by a grim old philosopher many years ago. In that brief sentence is a volume of truth. The man who goes about his daily task smiling at the difficulties that confront him and which, to be successful, he will have to overcome, the woman who goes cheerfully about her home planning her work and executing it as best she can, are living right. The results may fall short of their anticipations, but they have greater hope in the next attempt. In the face of reverses it is often hard to laugh at the world, but there is food for thought in the fact that the right spirit to do was in the work.

We will not sell our breeding stock of horses, Amos, but raise all the colts we can. It would be a great mistake to sell a good, sound mare, because horses are going to be very scarce at the end of the war. Prices will be much higher, and to reap the benefit of these high prices we must start raising colts at once. Practically all the native horses of Europe have been wiped out by the war; only the old and very young ones are left. As soon as peace is declared, people of Europe will have to start in building up what the war has destroyed—bridges, roads, buildings and practically everything that has been in the path of the war. Even the fields through which the trenches have been dug, or in which the shells have exploded will need to be leveled before they are fit for use. This can only be done with horses, because tractor machines will beyond the means of the people to buy; and what animals will France, Belgium, Germany or any of those countries which are fighting have to build up their waste country? Animals will be imported from all over the world and the biggest demand will be for workers—that is, rather heavy horses, weighing from 1,400 pounds up.

Mother, the funniest proposition that I have heard of in a long time is that which comes from some high-brow at the agricultural college suggesting that, in as much as the state is providing skilled advisors for the men of the farm, the women of the farm should also have advisors to their home work and management. Doubtless, there are some farm women who need advice and instruction, but the same may be said of the women of the cities; but the idea of having an official advisor snooping into ones household affairs and unearthing family secrets is so preposterous that it is unworthy of a moments consideration. By inference, alone, the proposition brands women of the farm generally as ignorant and shiftless, everybody who knows anything about it cannot but say it is grossly incorrect to say the least. As a matter of fact, the home training of a large majority of women of the farm is much superior to that of women who live in towns and cities, and for correct methods of home management the average farm woman has but few equals. The women of the farm as well as the men, are keeping well abreast of the times. Their homes are well supplied with the best newspapers and magazines containing excellent home department and practical advice in every department of homekeeping. The first thing a farm woman advisor would do would be to insult the mistress of the home by telling her things she would have to get to do her work according to the rules of domestic science, such as fireless cookers, oil stoves, washing machines, etc., all of which they are getting so fast as they can afford them—and would be insolent for a stranger to tell them they ought to do so. No, advisers for farm women are not needed, not even to make more officers or college graduates looking for a profitable job at bossing.

Gertrude, you'll get married some-where, even though the message you rote on the egg that went to market never answered. The right sort of life companion will come some day in the near future, and you'll accept a proposal to change your name. Here, now dear, don't pout, you could know that I was only joking but listen to me—I want to talk seriously to you on the subject. You just not lose sight of the fact that our love story will only begin at the altar. Ahead of you will be the struggle toward the ideal of happiness—and it is a double deal—you and your partner's. So, first of all, it is an ideal that demands compromise, forbearance and understanding. And one of these things ever occur to most romantic young people who are at as much in love with love as they are with each other! All of us erring mortals—thoughtless and reliable at times; helpless when we desire to serve and walled off in complete understanding by the firm that makes each of us an individual. But as you are imperfect, will be the one you will love—and you must follow your frailties and weaknesses. Add to your love tolerance and understanding and sympathy, and to that community of interests, essentials, and your marriage will be a great success. Husband and wife must agree about life. If one thinks it is a playground and the other feels it is a workshop, how are they to be happy, even if they try to adjust themselves and to compromise? There will be differences enough anyway, because he is a man and she is a woman, and because, all of the education and training has gone to emphasize their differences. So, as a counterbalance to these natural differences, there must be a community of interests, a sharing of tastes and mutual understanding of why certain things bring joy to one and not to another. With love and understanding, with sympathy and toleration, added to mutually shared tastes and mental congeniality your marriage ought indeed to be, and doubtless will be, a case of "and so they lived, happily ever after" in life as well as in fairy tales.

Printing Point Does Not Bob Up and Down

In an L. C. Smith & Bros. Typewriter the point on the paper which is to receive the type impression is stationary at the instant the type hits. The carriage does not bob up and down when the shift is made to write capitals.

Why?
Because the type is shifted—not the carriage.

The only movement of the carriage is back and forth on its closely adjusted ball bearing runways—and this does not take place while the print is being made. There is no lifting of the carriage.

This is one reason why L. C. Smith & Bros. typewriting is free from blurs and every letter in the right place.
