Buried Treasure of Many Millions in North Carolina.

A story which was given wide circulation is that at the outbreak of the European war, when it was currently reported that at the close of the war gold would be in demand, depositors in certain North Carolina banks withdrew their deposits and buried them in the ground pending the end of the war. It is said, but apparently not upon unimpeachable authority, that real gold, mined and minted with the government's own stamp thereon—between $300,000 and $500,000 of it—glimmers in the ground of Davidson County, N. C. Whether this be true or not, it is a matter of record, which the Charlotte Observer deplors, that certain citizens of Charlotte and Macklenburg County, which adjoins Davidson County, did withdraw their deposits from Charlotte banks upon just such a report of gold, and it is admitted that "possibly a portion of these withdrawn deposits still remain in hiding." Therefore, if the story of buried treasure is true, there is gold in North Carolina lands, in fact as well as in the theory. It does not appear, however, that the gold hidden in North Carolina lands consist of buried coins entirely. It is estimated that there is in North Carolina lands a sum of $3,500,000,000 lying as useless as the buried currency. There is a practically unpopulated area of some 22,380,000 acres in North Carolina, it is said, four-fifths of which is valuable for cultivation—blossom like the rose. It is twice the size of Belgium, and is said to be capable of furnishing every man in that European state a farm of twice the size of the fields he has been used to cultivating. At that is said there would still be left 9,000,000 acres for woodland development. Although there have already come to North Carolina several successful Belgian colonies since the outbreak of the war, it is hardly probable that any possible publicity of this opportunity will lead to any considerable transfer of Belgian farmers to the Tar Heel State. The unpopulated cultivable lands of North Carolina, it is estimated, would approximate 175,000 farms of 50 acres each. The average 50-acre farm in the South will bring a good farmer about $1200 gross per annum, which amount multiplied by the possible 175,000 North Carolina fifty-acre farms, represents a 6 per cent interest upon a principal which should approximate the value of these lands.
