Mr. Wilson , remarks on salesmanship and the opportunities that have come to the Unitedl States to expand its commerce are worth considering merely as coming from the president. They repeat in general what is being preached day in and day out by the business interests that have examined the situation and formed an estimate of future possibilities. Mr. Wilson also shows he appreciates the necessity of an American merchant marine. If he will abandon his plan for putting the government into the shipping business and put up to Congress the passage of laws to encourage private enterprise in this direction he will find no trouble about getting that which we so surely need. While he clings to his present plan business men in general will have little respect for his advice on business subjects.
