

THE DISLOYAL GERMAN LANGUAGE NEWSPAPERS

Their Loyalty to the Kaiser and Denounce the Allies.

The German-language press of America has been, and still is, the most powerful force of all in promoting disloyalty to the Teutonic element among German subjects but also among Americans who have become converts to the anti-American sentiment.

To see this right enter a German hour, when the barkeeper and the waiter, under the influence of beer, tell their opinions. Sit down and read one of the poisonous sheets so that you are thought to be a German; then talk to them, and you will find out their sentiment. You will understand how, for instance, the readers of the Philadelphia "Tageblatt" are encensed by so bold an editorial as the following which appeared under the caption "They Don't Want War."

"The German chancellor has offered a very gracious basis for peace. Lloyd-George answers, 'The war is now a war between two groups of different national ideals.' This contention of the British minister is a lie and a swindle. But in case he wants to get 'ideals' he has enough of them in the program that has been adopted by the German Reichstag, of which he did not say anything to his hearers, for good reasons.

"The English minister was not satisfied with the speech of the chancellor (Dr. Michaelis) he had, in the adoption of this resolution (so-called peace resolution) by a two-thirds majority of the reichstag a guarantee that Germany will not make unfair demands. The road was open if he wanted peace. But the gang, the gang of robbers, does not want to beat Germany. There is nothing left but to cure them of such an illusion with the hardest blows."

The editor and, as he often boastfully states, real publisher of the Philadelphia "Tageblatt" is Mr. Lewis Werner, who was a Socialist as long as his paper was dependent on the financial support of the Socialist organizations. But during the Philadelphia municipal campaign of 1915 Mr. Werner, while continuing to publish Socialist editorials, printed every day one page of articles in favor of the City party, as the fusion against the McNichols machine was popularly called. He did so only after the managers of the City party had pledged their word that the official city advertisements would be printed henceforth in the "Tageblatt" in case the fusion candidate, Mr. Weaver, were elected mayor of Philadelphia. Mr. Weaver has received since that time tens of thousands of dollars a year for corporation notices.

The editor of the "Tagblatt" must be very sure that the city government of Philadelphia will not withdraw the official advertisements on account of his rabid pro-German propaganda. Otherwise he would not dare to make his insidious attacks on the "Allied gang of robbers," one of which is the United States.

Trying to Embroider the United States and Japan.

An indirect fling at this country is taken by the "Detroit Abendpost." This paper did not name the United States, only Brazil, Portugal and Sam. But, of course, the readers are expected to draw certain conclusions in connection with the seizing of German merchant ships by Uncle Sam. Says the "Detroit Abendpost": "The Siamese have augmented the number of naval and merchant vessels by nine German ones. When these cowards declared war on Germany they had no other purpose than stealing ships—worthy allies of Brazil and Portugal."

The same paper hints that the United States will be attacked by Japan, a favorite trick to create sentiment against sending American troops to Europe. The editorial notice reads:

"Our president has been presented with a more than 600-year-old Samurai sword by the Japanese artist, J. Yoshida. We would not be surprised at all if Wilson would have to draw this sword against the country of the donor."

Also, Mr. Hearst's "Deutsches Journal," of New York, protests against the sending of an American army to France. It does not say so directly, but indirectly, by demanding that volunteers and foreigners should first be sent to the front. That would greatly delay the effective participation of this country in the war, and bring about the victory of the kaiser in case the German-language press's contention, that Germany will ultimately win if she is not defeated within a short period is true.

A Favorite Pastime with the German Language Press.

To ridicule America and her allies is a favorite pastime of the insidious German-language press. The notorious "Brooklyn Freie Presse," of Brooklyn, gloats over Russia's recent defeat in Galicia by saying: "Russia will hold out to the end. That may be the easier as Russia has already arrived at her end."

"Now Germany will be Colored" is a headline of the "California Demokrat," of San Francisco, referring to the President, and continues: "President Wilson signed yesterday the bill providing $640,000,000 for an air fleet."

The "Westliche Post," of St. Louis, has something to say about the alleged brutality of the allies. One of its articles reads as follows. "These unspeakable cruelties that will be a dark page in the history of the Russian army for all time can be traced directly to the instigation of officers of the Russian line, a gang of brutal and wanton drunkards and libertines."

To promote the kaiser's cause by creating distrust among the allies and bringing about the withdrawal of this country from the war the same paper says:

"Even the large vestage of doubt regarding the unfaithfulness of the allies as far as Serbia is concerned has been destroyed by the disclosures in the Russian press. Our own government should be cautious."

The integrity of the allies is impugned by the "Detroit Abendpost" in an article on "Spain's Future," in which it is contended that Germany's enemies are attempting to bring about a revolution in Spain. The article continues:

"Since the beginning of the war England has kept thousands of agents and spies in Spain and spent many millions for a propaganda to punish King Alfonso because he refused to give up his neutrality."

To frighten the American people and create a recipient mood for the kaiser's arrogant peace proposals, the German language press depicts the military and financial situation of the allies as desperate.

The most insidious piece of work of this kind is a cartoon published on the front page of the "Detroit Abendpost." It shows Kerensky on the other side of the ocean shouting, "Sam, Help!" and Uncle Sam answering: "Where can I get ships?" The meaning of the cartoon is further explained by this impudent "poem."

Kerensky, a Socialist, But at present a little czar, Began an offensive That was already over when it started Now he shouts for help. He who is in the White House and Does himself not know what to do Because he lacks at present Ships and men, is expected To help the Russians. Such is the irony of our time That it exposes meanness, Crime which instigates war— In this manner swindle is made evident.

We went to war—why? The pretext is too foolish. The whole world is informed, And we pity him. Who is not— We fight for the British. To be correct, we don't fight yet Because we lack armies. For the time being only millions Of our money go to the front To beat the kaiser.

A milder example of this kind of propaganda may be found in the "Illinois Staats-Zeitung," of Chicago which says ironically:

"The allies have decided to terminate their Balkan victories, to give up Saloniki as they have given up the Dardanells. It is to be hoped that there is sufficient French laurel to make a garland for Mr. Serrail (the French general)."

More explicit is the "Waechter und Anzeiger," of Cleveland, by saying that it is intended to "Save the last reminder of French power" by English counter strokes, and that the man power of France is exhausted, while the Germans can better stand losses, and lose only half as many men as the western allies.

The readers of the "Cincinnati Volksblatt," of Cincinnati, are informed that peace will be brought about by the financial debacle of Great Britain.

That the United States entered the war to attain either military power, or financial profit, or political prestige is contended in an editorial of the "Waechter und Anzeiger," of Cleveland.

The Defenders of "Democracy" Want to Be Dictators.

The same tune is played by the "Abendpost" (evening edition) of the "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung," in the following remarks:

"Russia, England and the United States go to war to defeat autocracy elsewhere. But they themselves want to be dictators."

But there happened a slip in the editorial department of the "Staats-Zeitung." In an English article, the morning edition of the paper admits that Germany was willing to fight to expand her commerce:

"And is here that perhaps the greatest contribution to future peace can be made. Whatever other factors may have entered into the war, its fundamental cause was economic. Germany came late into the family of great nations, and when she arrived she found a very little left of the world's commercial and territorial patrimony. As a vigorous youth Germany resented the attempt of Great Britain to apply the principle of primogeniture. She was rapidly outgrowing the portion of a younger son, and demanded a share of the world's goods sufficient to satisfy the needs of a rapidly expanding population and a constantly increasing commerce. She ought to acquire them peaceably, but when compelled to do so was willing to fight for them."
