

"A Man Without a Country."

"Damn the United States! I hope I may never hear of it again!"
This was the exclamation of Lieutenant Phillip Nolan, on trial before a military court, charged with treason.

The story of "A Man Without a Country" is based upon the great classic of Edward Everett Hale, but the picture goes beyond that and deals with a story of the present hour, how a Pacifist who cursed the United States when it went to war, and how the vision of the life of the Man Without a Country reawakened in his heart the flame of patriotism.

"A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY." Greatest Patriotic Film Since We Entered The War.

You may see some of your friends in this big Jewel photoplay "The Man Without a Country," which is to be presented at the Gem Theatre in this city, on Monday, September 23. Owing to the demand for this picture the management of the Gem Theatre were only able to procure it for a one night run, and in order to give everybody an opportunity to see this great production they will start the first show at 7 p.m., by doing this it will enable them to give three complete shows.

Two thousand American soldiers in uniform, who were being transferred from Fort Slocum to Fort Hamilton, appeared in the final scenes of the production.

When approached for cooperation in filming the picture, Lieutenant Colonel Maulden, who was in charge of the detachment, said:

"We are glad to help. A picture like this one will do more good than a thousand patriotic speeches."

The story in "The Man Without a Country" is based upon the great classic of Edward Everett Hale, but the story goes beyond a recital of the career of the man who lost his country through his treachery, and brings besides, a story that belongs to the present hour—the story of a pacifist who cursed the United States when it went to war, and of how, the vision of the life of "The Man Without a Country" reawakened in his heart the flame of patriotism, and would not let him rest until he had donned khaki and entered the ranks of the fighters for the freedom of the world.

"The Man Without a Country" is the greatest and last appearance of Florence La Sadie, who was the heroine in the photoplay, and who has died since its production, leaving to posterity what has proven the greatest patriotic film created since we entered the war.

Within the past three months, "The Man Without a Country" has carried a wave of patriotic enthusiasm with it and has helped to success recruiting, Red Cross, Liberty Loan and other campaigns.

In many cities it has been attended by school children en masse and has proved to be one of the greatest patriotic lessons imaginable.

"Damn the United States! I hope I may never hear of it again!" This was the exclamation of Lieutenant Phillip Nolan, on trial before a military court, charged with treason.

The court sentenced him to have his wish fulfilled, and years after, the solitary old man, who for years had never heard the name of the United States, died blessing the country that he had cast off in his rash youth.

The story by Hale is woven into a story in modern setting, and the film not only gives the rehearsal of the old classic, but tells also a stirring story of a slacker in the present war, and the spark of patriotism was awakened and the regenerated man enrolled himself under the flag to serve in the fight for freedom of the world.

He Wants a Liberty Bond

Future generations will revel in a lifetime study of the world war. The name of a Foch, a Pershing, a Haig or some general as yet unknown to fame will supercede that of Napoleon as history's greatest warrior. Every slightest factor of the struggle will be reviewed, argued, decided creditable or discreditable to those participating in it.

The fact that you bought a Liberty Bond will not of itself give you a clear record. If you bought TO YOUR UTMOST, you could have done all President Wilson, General Pershing, your son at the front, could ask.

Make the Fourth Liberty Loan a bright page in an honorable record of war effort.
