SEVEN DAYS OVER TRAIL

In view of modern methods of travel, when one can go to Portland from Tillamook by auto in 5 hours, it sounds like ancient history, when an old pioneer relates that it took the greater part of seven days to come from North Yamhill to Tillamook on horseback, over a dim Indian trail in 1863, but Margaret Holden of this city was one of a party, headed by her father, who had just that experience before she first spied the beautiful water of the Tillamook Bay. She was then a child about 13 years of age, and six camp fires along the lonely trail attested the length of the trip. In places the trail had to be widened so that the pack animals could pass along with their loads, and that took time. The party was composed of her father and mother, Joseph Edwards and wife—her sister, Mary who afterwards married Hiram Terwilliger, son of a Portland pioneer, and her brothers John and George.

The subject of this sketch, Mrs. Holden, then Margaret Edwards married Horace Holden, whom she survives, at the age of 70 years. Her husband, Horace Holden, was born in Massachusetts, and before coming to Oregon, made two trips to the Sandwich Islands, later coming out and settling near Salem, thence to Tillamook county, where he resided for many years. The Edwards came from Keokuk county, Iowa, starting on the long journey by ox team in 1863 across the Plains, bound for the verdant fields of Oregon. The trip across the Plains, is well remembered by Mrs. Holden, as she was then a child and took much interest in the event. Only on one occasion was the train of 28 wagons molested, and then some marauding Sioux Indians, endeavored to stampede the horse-herd one night, but failed. The Edwards arrived in Oregon in the fall, and the trip was one of the quickest ever made, owing to the train discipline and the activity of the leaders. In the fall of 1863 the family left North Yamhill for Tillamook, bringing some of their household goods by pack train, the remainder being shipped in later on a little schooner from Portland. Mrs. Holden describes the then Tillamook as "a store and two houses"—the town was practically unborn; and the few families of the new coast section, were scattered along the bay shores, and east and south of the present town. The greatest inconvenience of life in the new country was the matter of getting flour and other household necessities from the outside, and salmon and potatoes and such garden stuff as they could raise constituted the principal provision asset of the then isolated Tillamook country. Indians were numerous in those days, and Mrs. Holden remembers of seeing the Indian Chief Kelches, who was always friendly to the whites. The men hunted much in those days, and elk and deer were plentiful, the deer and elk fat and the delicious venison was an agreeable addition to the family larder, when the hunters were successful. The social features of the community included neighborhood dances, when the fiddler played the old-fashioned quadrilles, and in which they instilled much harmony and sweetness of expression, even though they lacked the blatant jazz and classical flavor. Their social gatherings were characterized by that frontier friendliness and good will, which now is not so conspicuous as it used to be. In those days people went visiting, taking the whole family, and having a good time. Neighborliness was a then a virtue, and everybody knew the latest home, and hastened to render friendly service, and thus, lasting friendships were promoted. The Edwards remained in "town" for a time after their arrival, and then removed to their home at one and one-half miles east of town, which is now cut up into small tracts, with many homes.
