

ARDENT FISHERMAN MAKES LARGE CATCH

J. D. Boyle, of Portland, who makes the famous 'Doc. Shelton' spinner, well known to local fishermen, was in the city last week. While here he launched his King folding canvas canoe and navigated the Trask one day, catching a nice crew of trout. Mr. Boyle is an ardent sportsman and has several new spinners to his credit as a result of his knowledge of trout, habits and manufacturing them for the market. Boyle camps out, like any other real sportsman and thoroughly enjoys every minute of his vacation. He thinks the rivers that flow into the Tillamook bay are fine streams for trout, but says the constant heavy drain on the fishy tribe by the thousands of sportsmen and alleged sports is rapidly thinning them out. He believes that artificial hatching of game fish is the only thing that will keep the trout from becoming extinct. And he is right. The toll is something great each year.

MONTANA TROUT FRY FOR LOCAL STREAMS

A shipment of 224,000 black spotted Montana trout eggs was received at the Gold Creek hatchery last week. They came through in prime condition and are now being hatched. The Montana black-spotted is a Cut-throat, but the waters of Montana give it its dark spotted color and markings. They will be placed in Tillamook lakes and streams when large enough, upon requisition. The big Eastern brook trout brought from the Cascades lakes are doing well, and growing very fast in the hatchery ponds.

Scott, who is a surveyor told M. E. Gruber of the Trask house that he was surprised to find that there was a better route down the north fork for a state road than the Wilson river route would afford. He and his party hiked for four days looking over a pass from Cherry Grove to a junction with Trask road and is enthusiastic in his claim that it is a much better route than the Wilson river road and hopes to see it improved as a state highway. Mr. Scott thinks the new route is as near if not nearer to Portland from Tillamook, than any other line that could be chosen.

Contractor Feldschau has opened up for travel one side of the 800 yard strip of highway beyond the cheese factory which was laid some weeks ago, and which has been drying for some time.
