SCARED BY BAD LUCK BIRD

Sea Gull of Evil Omen Has "Got the Goat" of Residents of Pelham Bay.

Pelham Bay is holding its breath and waiting for the next catastrophe. What the catastrophe will be no one dares to prophesy, but that there will be misfortune of some kind no one familiar with the bay would doubt. For the bird of ill omen has appeared again, says the New York Sun and Globe. The bird is an elderly and disgruntled sea gull which looks like a cross between Shakespeare's Polonius and Poe's raven.

It sits around on the rocks that dot the bay and looks exceedingly elderly and disgruntled and misanthropic and ominous. If transmigration of souls happens in the bird world, the creature is undoubtedly the raven or Polonius or both. "Nevermore" is that bird's middle name and its philosophy of life.

Bungalovists around Pelham bay all remember the extraordinary series of fatalities that occurred last summer in the wake of the bird of ill omen. It was nearly June of last year when the bird first put in an appearance, looking no less acridulous than it does today.

Hardly had the bird's peevish face and gray-white feathers first been seen than three fishermen upset their boat. One was drowned and the other two were pulled out barely conscious.

Two weeks later, while the evil eye of the bird was still on the bay and its inhabitants, came the great storm which will be remembered as long as anybody lives who saw it or was caught in it.

Then came the whale scare which put a crimp in the long-distance swimming contests. And there came one thing and another. A host of unkillable rats overran Chimneysswey islands, pride of the bay. A swimmer was drowned within fifty yards of a boathouse. The captain, most picturesque of 300-pound men and one of the historic figures of the bay, left it flat and emigrated to the Bronx.

All because of the bird of ill omen, says the Bay. Not a doubt in the world.

When winter came Pelham Bay hoped the bird would go South and forget to come back, but this dyspeptic-looking granduncle of all sea gulls has an enviable memory. Here he is again, and has been here since March. Bungalovists of Pelham feel sure that nothing else but that bird caused the extremely cold spring—perhaps even caused the sun to lose its three degrees of heat or whatever the amount.

The bird doesn't cut up any antics, you understand. He—the captain because he departed insisted it was she—just sits on a rock, looking more like an ill omen than anything you ever saw. Pelham Bay is waiting with some anxiety. As long as the bird of ill omen sticks around it believes with some reason that anything is more than likely to happen.

ON SILENT GUARD

Explanation of Mysterious Figure in Grecian Cave.

If Surmise is Correct, Grim Custodian of Treasure Was Most Cunningly Devised.

Always the Thracian peasant is stirred to tell you stories of caves. I once employed a queer man-of-all-trades as a foreman of excavation. He was a Thracian Greek from Varna, on the Black sea, where he had been driven by Bulgarians into Greece. He had mostly been a sailor on the Pontic coasts, but he had been to many lands and knew Asia Minor well.

"I could tell you a queer story," he said to me one evening in true sailor fashion, "that a farmer once told me in a village near Smyrna." He lit his pipe (only sailormen among Greeks take to pipes), and started his story after we had finished our digging and were taking our evening coffee by our tents. "This farmer went once far inland into the hills. He found the entrance to a deep cave and with a certain hesitation, went in. He found himself in a well-cut tunnel that led straight into the rock. After a time he turned a corner and saw a red glimmer of flame.

"Gently alarmed, he moved on very quietly and cautiously. Again he rounded a bend and saw, at the end of a straight stretch a blaze of fire coming out from a natural vent in the rock. He stopped motionless, for there in front of the flame, was seated the figure of a man perfectly still. He crept on cautiously. Suddenly, as he advanced, the figure rose, rigidly, to its feet, swung round and faced him. He could not see its face, for it was against the light. He took one more nervous step forward and, as he did so, the rigid figure lifted in both its hands a huge hammer, still facing him. He stepped back, and as he did so the figure lowered the hammer. He stepped back one more step, and the figure sat down again. Less nervous, he advanced again.

"As he did so the figure rose once more, silent and rigid. He made one more step, and it lifted its hammer menacingly once more. Again he withdrew, and the figure lowered its hammer and sat down. Now he was thoroughly alarmed and made his way quickly out of the tunnel."

"Did he find out who the man was?" I asked.

"No," replied my sailorman, "he did not, neither did he try. But his opinion is," he continued, "that there was a vast treasure buried in that cave, and the owner had made a mechanical figure which worked automatically by some mechanism that operated from the floor. As you went in you trod upon the levers and the figure rose to its feet. You went further and it lifted its hammer. If that farmer had taken one step more he would have been a dead man. The fire was a natural vent of gas that was never quenched. There are many such away back in Asia Minor and Persia." He paused, as ancient mariners always pause after they have reached their finest effect: "You would have liked to excavate that cave," he said, simply.

I often wonder what element of truth was at the bottom of that story. All one can be certain of is that the Smyrniot farmer left the cavern in a very great fright. But who is not really afraid of caverns in his inmost heart? We call it "caution"; we are afraid lest the roof fall in and bury us, lest we disappear down some unexpected hole. Really, it is the inborn terror of the dark that frightens us, perhaps itself born of the danger that beset primitive man in caves—cave lions, cave bears, or some last remnant of an earlier, more savage strain of man, the prototype of the ogre of the fairy story.—Exchange.

WANTS TO FEED US CARIBOU

Scott C. Bone, governor of Alaska, estimates that the huge territory under his jurisdiction is the home of approximately a million caribou, and he believes that their steaks and chops would be a welcome article of diet on the American table. He is pressing the administration with his caribou meat proposal, which is warranted to put Alaska on the culinary map.—From the Argonaut.

SHIPS OPERATED BY ELECTRICITY

Two electrically-driven ships are now being completed for service between Duluth and New York city. The ships are 258 feet long and will have a net tonnage of 2,000 tons for operation through the New York state barge canal.

DIG UP STATUE OF MINERVA

A colossal seated statue of Minerva, carved from colored alabaster, has been discovered on the site of the Emporium, which was a landing place on the Tiber for marble shipments in the days of republican and imperial Rome. Surrounding Emporium were schools of marble cutters and sculptors and there also were many Hellenistic art associations.

WORKMEN DIGGING FOUNDATION

Workmen digging the foundation for a building came upon the statue, which is carved in the most exquisite Hellenistic style. Its color is said to make it unique.

THE CRIMINAL COURT BY CHARLES S. WILTISE

In the examination of telegrams in the Criminal court by Charles S. Wiltise, attorney for a defendant on trial, a dialogue occurred between Mr. Wiltise and William J. Freaney, 1130 North New Jersey street, a plumber, who was a telegrapher, that created a ripple of merriment throughout the courtroom.

"Have you ever had any previous jury service?" Mr. Wiltise asked.

"Yes, in this court about fifty years ago," was the reply.

"Do you have any recollection as to the kind of case that was?" the attorney asked.

"Yes, it was a petty criminal case," Mr. Freaney replied. "The jury hung all night to get an extra day."

"You deliberated all night because you had some sincere opinion in the case?" Mr. Wiltise asked.

"No, I stayed because I couldn't get out," he replied.—Indianapolis News.
