A MODEL INSTITUTION

Owing to wise provisions laid down in the rules adopted by the first Board of regents that Oregon State Normal School at Monmouth has become educational institution for any one of the forty eight states.
 The school is confined absolutely to training teachers for the public schools, all other professional training is excluded from its courses of study, as well as in collegiate athletics.
 Whatever is required to equip a young man or woman to be an efficient instructor in any of the grades of the public schools, including good manners, conduct relation to pupils, and the community, is taught.
 There are four terms annually, the school operating through the year, and all entering must sign an agreement that they propose teaching in the public schools for least two years, paying tuition of $24 a year.
 The annual enrollment is 1200 and summer schools extending the standards of the State Normal School are held at Pendleton and Ashland in distant part of the state to save students travelling expenses.
 First class dormitory service of rooms, board and laundry, (no extras but ten cents an hour for an electric flatiron,) are furnished at six dollars a week, and the school makes a profit on that for upkeep.
 The dormitory has earned a surplus each year out of which repairs and new buildings in the way of extensions are made and paid for, and students are permitted to work and are paid by the hour to help expenses.
 The institutions is democratic. There is nothing free. On the other hand the equipment and teaching force are as good as money will supply and the pupils are given positions in the state schools at good pay.
