LEGION BOX MATCHES CONSIDERED GOOD

The boxing contests under the auspices of the American Legion last Saturday night brought out a good sized house. A number of women were spectators.

The main event was a ten round setto between Lewis Johnson, the clever and hard-hitting Cloverdale boy, and Lone Wolf McDonald of Portland. McDonald had the advantage in height and ring experience, but was kept quite busy dodging the "sockers" sent in his direction by the Cloverdale boy. Things were about even until the third round when McDonald struck Johnson over the temple, knocking him down. The latter took the count to eight, and then got to his feet and was fighting at end of the round. In the fourth round Johnson drew claret from the Lone Wolf's nose, and in following rounds increased the gory stream. Johnson proved an adept at dodging hard swings and straight leads, but the Wolf, like the real species, was also a wary fighter. The fight progressed the full ten rounds, and when the gong rang, both men were working hard for a knockout. The referee declared the fight a draw, which was considered a good decision.

The four round contest between Illingsworth and Stevens, both local boys, was lively while it lasted. Stevens took the aggressive on the start, and had the first round to his credit. In the second round Illingsworth had his opponent's measure, and sailed in, giving Stevens an awful lacing in a neutral corner. In the third round Illingsworth showed fine form, and ended the fight with a hard left to Stevens jaw, flooring him for good, in picture of a previous arrangement "not With more ring practice Illingsworth should develop into a comer. He has a hard wallop in either glove, and is cool and heady.

Joe Clarke of Portland and Al Gillette of Helloff, went through four rounds of the prettiest wrestling ever seen in a Tillamook roped arena. Clarke was the aggressor, and really wanted to box, but the prancing Gillette wouldn't let him. The crowd voiced its disapproval by sundry but earnest "boos." At the conclusion of the four rounds of clinching and short arm pecks, the referee declared the wrestling match a draw.

The next contest was a hugging match between Johnnie Green and Buddy Stengel, both of Portland. About two-thirds of the time that should be spent in real boxing, was employed in hanging on to each other with a tenderness that caused suspicion of a previous arrangement "not to hurt each other." Greens, while not hugging, did a cross between a cake-walk and a muscle-dance, and Stengel seemed ever willing to caress his opponent when there was opportunity, which was too often to suit the crowd. The referee held up a hand of each of the huggers at the end of the last canto.

But, leaving out the wrestling match and the hugging match, the crowd got the worth of its money in the Johnson-McDonald go, and the hard fought bout between Illingsworth and Stevens. The Lone Wolf is a good, clean boxer, and at the end of the fight with Johnson, declared the latter to be "a good man." Both shook hands after the fight. Johnson declared the Wolf to be the "hardest man he had ever met" in his short career, and both will be favorites with Tillamook fight fans in future boxing programmes. Jim Mitchell refereed all fights, and satisfied most of the fans with his decisions, although there were those present who thought Clark had the edge on Gillette. W. R. Bennett officiated as time-keeper.

JAPANESE OYSTERS MAY BE PLANTED

Thos. W. Ross of the state game commission, who was in the city last Thursday, stated while here that in Japan are oysters even larger than the eastern oyster that is propagated on this coast and which would stand a better show of weathering low temperatures than our native small oysters, for the reason that they can stand five degrees colder weather than the indigenous variety over at Netarts. The new and enterprising commissioner may get enough of one, two and three years old Japanese oysters to plant in Netarts, or in some of the other bays of the county. From the spat of the imported oyster experiments could be made as to the most advantageous way to assist nature in successful propagation of a new species in this country.

A. M. Austin of this city, is perhaps the best posted man in this county on oyster cultivation. He experimented with the native Netarts oyster for 25 years and is still of the opinion that he could make a success of the oyster business, provided he had the requisite money to go at it right. He states that the star fish is one of the worst pests the oyster has to contend with. But he says that Netarts bay is not much infested with that fish. As a pest they are easily removed by what is known as the bay oyster and the Netarts bay oyster are not the same species, there being marked differences in the two kinds. "The Netarts native oyster is larger and has a flavor distinctively its own. It also has a greenish marking, not found on the Shoalwater kind." "Forty-five years ago, vessels, or more properly speaking, coasting schooners, came up from San Francisco into Netarts bay, and these fine bivalves were stacked along the beach just inside the bay which were then loaded into the schooners and taken south. The result was that the bay was pretty well gutted of oysters."
