EARLY SETTLEMENT OF TILLAMOOK COUNTY

(Continued from page 4) also the tide was high at noon, so that we would be compelled to cross every headland on the beach. This beach is about eight or nine miles long, at low tide you may walk around nearly all of the headlands, or points. We fixed up this rude shelter the best we could and turned in but we got very little sleep, for the rain blew in upon us so hard we had to crouch together instead of being able to take a recumbent position. We were stirring by time in the morning and prepared a hearty meal and inquired of Haines how he felt and if he felt like going back. Well said he, I am going with you two fellows, if I don't want to go back over those mountains alone. So at daylight we left Elk Creek and took the beach, it had ceased raining but the wind blew heavy from the southwest, causing a very heavy surf on the beach. The first headland we reached we decided to run the gauntlet and endeavor to get around, instead of climbing over, between every roller we would make a dash and we did eventually make it, but it was the only piece of good luck we had, for owing to the very high tide and the precipitous nature of the bluffs we had to climb the balance, which in places attains an altitude of from 300 to 400 feet. About 2 p. m. we arrived at a bald mountain which appeared to be about four or five miles in extent. This was Carney and was tough climbing in those days. The trail ran close to the edge of a fearful precipice, it was for a long time the terror of persons taking that route, we have known a number of travelers to get around this point by what we "old uns" call "cooning it" viz: Crawl on your hands and knees. At the present time the trail is greatly improved. About 4 p. m. we came upon an old Indian village on the banks of the Nehalem, opposite what is now termed Fishers Point. The village was entirely deserted the Indians at this time of the year having journeyed up the Nehalem to fish, and dry salmon for winter use, so our guide informed us. In those days they used to catch large quantities of Chum or spotted salmon and dry them. Their method of drying them was to split them from head to tail, spread them with small cedar sticks, a rack was made the entire length of their drying house, and lay the fish thereon, and build a fire under them, when nearly dry the rack would be raised, a fresh one put in its place, and so on until the house is above full. We have seen tons of fish dried in their houses at a time. The Indians also dry a large stock of salmon roes, likewise their fresh meats such as elk and deer. Many would also dry "cockles" a species of clam with a ridged shell and string them on strings and suspend them over their fires, very much in the old way of drying apples, but I digress.
