LIME GOOD FOR SOIL.

Following extract from Alva Agee's Book. Crops and Methods for soil improvement:

Within recent years we have learned that vast areas do not contain enough lime in available form to keep the soil from becoming acid. Some soils never were rich in lime, and these are the first to show evidence of acidity. In our limestone area, however, acid soil conditions are developing year by year, limiting the growth of clover and effecting the yields of other crops.

The situation is a serious one just in so far as men refuse to recognize the facts as they exist, and permit the limiting of crop yield, through the presence of harmful acids. The natural correction is lime, which combines with the acid and leaves the soil friendly to all plant life and especially to the clovers and other legumes that are necessary to profitable farming. Nature is largely dependent upon man's assistance in the correction of soil acidity.

There are tens of thousands of land owners who do not recognize the need of lime that now exists in their soil and suffer a loss of income which they attribute to other causes.

There are land owners who are not concerned with present day knowledge regarding soil acidity because cannot believe it has any bearing upon the state of their soils. They know that their soils formerly produced good clover. The failures of the clovers in the last ten or fifteen years they incline to attribute to adverse seasons, poor seed or the prevalence of weed pests. They fail to realize that the loss of lime is continuous and that every year more and more land becomes acid, and with the accumulation of acid comes the failure of clover crops. The Cornell station reports the following experience:

The soil was once a fertile loam that had become very poor. A part was given an application of lime, and similar land at its side was left unlimed. The land without lime and fertilizer of any kind made a yield of 1824 pounds of clover hay per acre. A complete fertilizer on the unlimed land made the yield 2235 pounds, and 15 tons of manure on the unlimed land made the yield 2091 pounds.

Where lime had been applied, the unfertilized land yielded 3852 pounds per acre, and the fertilized, 4085 pounds, and the manured, 4976 pounds. Manure and fertilizer were nearly inactive in the acid soil. The lime enabled the plants to obtain benefit from the plant food.

When land owners refuse to let their soil remain deficient in lime, clover will come into prominence in our agriculture that it never previously has known. Clovers and the grasses want an alkaline soil, and there is a waste of money and time in seeding acid land.

That a snake will commit suicide to escape torture was demonstrated at Silver Lake, when two cats, the property of a homesteader near the lake, herded a big diamond rattler into a bill of red ants.
