TUESDAY MARCH 2, 1915.

In his speech before the British parliament last week, Mr. Lloyd George, chancellor of the exchequer, referring to Russia's financial ability, made the following statement: "Russia has, since the war began, enormously increased her resources by suppressing the sale of all intoxicating liquors. By that means alone she has increased the productivity of her labor by something between thirty and fifty per cent." That is certainly a significant admission to receive the endorsement of the British finance minister. It suggests the inquiry, Why has not Great Britain taken like steps to increase her own productivity and resources? If prohibition is good for Russia it would be good for the British people also. And by the same token, what is good for both of them would be good for America. The Yankee is proverbially smart; when will he be economically wise as well?

AN ATHEIST TURNS TO GOD.

Of all the lonely people on this earth the atheist is the loneliest. He may have living parents, wife, children, brothers, sisters, friends, but not having God he is like an outcast on the uninhabited island, for in his intellectual nature, his inner selfhood he has no supporter, no supporter, no helper, no defender, no deliverer, no one whom he can turn in perplexity, in great sorrow, pain, or suffering, drops it, for he denies the God who made him and who Himself would be with him and help him.

It is a cheerless, useless, hopeless, lost soul in need of help.

It is a heroic thing to give up a friendship of any kind, but to give up friendship with God requires an effort to eradicate that belief in Him from one's mind if as to the existence of God, it may be so in some instances, but whenever so, it may be taken for granted that the atheists thus described are unhappier or better satisfied in their unfaith than they were in their faith. Atheism never helped any mortal in any view of life's problems in any moral conception. It is negative only, empty, dry, cheerless, joyless worthless and full of despair.

Every now and then there will appear a glowing view of the folly, foolishness, error and pernicious effects of atheism.

A remarkable case is reported from Fez by the Zurich News, translated for the Presbyterian Witness, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, Read it:

"The celebrated French novelist and poet, Lasserdat, who lived up to the present time has had for all faith in God, for every religious creation, no belief of what creed, nothing but sarcasm, mockery and scornful irony, now in an open confession urges his people to return to this faith as the only safe and secure foundation. And radical French papers, even the anti-clerical French papers, publish his avowal with respect. It is a document for the gods, godheads as follows:

"'I laughed at faith and held myself for a wise man. But there was no cheerfulness in my laughter when I saw France bleeding and weeping. I stood by the road and looked at the soldiers. There they marched cheerfully on to death. I asked, "What makes you so calm?" and they began to pray, "I believe in God!" I counted the sacrifices of our nation, and saw how the people prayed for strength to make them strong. It seemed to me, in my misery, that they knew of a heavenly fatherland shining with love, while earth burns in hate. But such knowledge is a science, a science of children. And I am no longer a child. This is what I lack, and the sight of love chills me. That nation must despair which cannot believe that the pain of earth will be the joy of the heaven. To hope when all fails and can do this without faith! Is not our daily labor torment, is not all goodness an absurdity, if a man does not believe?

"'I stand by the bloody streams of Verdun. I see the holy water of her tears. I am in despair. * * * How forceful and burning are the wounds of a people in which not a drop of blood of that mystery flows, as a healing balsam, that mystery, ah! I dare not name him. He was so good, and I—

* * * *

"What is to become of France if her children do not believe, and if her men and women do not pray?

"'The soul of France is great. It was a France that believed. The present of France is distress. A France that no longer believes (who?). Shall the future be better? It is in God's hand.

"'Of a million of the dead covers the field. How shall it be by this time? * * * I know not whether I shall survive. I wonder does not die as a subject. I do not feel that disappear. * * * The thunder oppresses me. There is a God and you stand so far from him! Believe, oh, my soul, that I have returned to know this hour when I was fooled and saved. I believe in God! I believe! I believe! This word is the most fine word of humanity. Whether it is true or not, for him it is right.'"

The forgoing revelation should be carefully considered by every one.

What is to become of America if her children do not believe, and if her men and women do not pray?

"To forsake God is to forsake all indeed."

Without faith no man can hope when all else fails him.

And every man is coming to the hour when all else will fail him.—Y. M. C. A.

FARMERS URGED TO KEEP ACCOUNTS

By Dan C. Sowers

(Professor of Municipalities and Public Accounting at the University of Oregon.)

A farmer should keep accurate accounts for the same reason that men in other lines of business should keep accounts, viz., to learn whether he is making a profit or a loss, to ascertain on which lines of business he is securing the most profit or sustaining the greatest loss, to learn how to stop on losses or leaks, and to determine whether it would be more profitable for him to invest his capital in some other kind of business.

The farmer's business like that of every other business enterprise can be divided into three functions: production, selling and accounting. The farmer who raises a bushel of wheat, take it to the market and sells it and records the transaction in his note-book performs the three functions, and he should separate these functions in his own mind and in his accounting system so that the cost of each may be ascertained. The cost of marketing depends upon his distance from the railroad and the condition of the roads and both of these factors may be so large as to make it almost impossible to raise certain classes of products at a profit under existing conditions, whereas improvements of the roads or the substitution of motor transportation may so reduce the cost of marketing as to make the previously unprofitable crop a profitable one. Every farmer should know the cost of producing a bushel of wheat, corn or oats from his place to the nearest market.

Turning now to the production side we find that many items enter which ordinarily included by men in other lines of business, such as the value of his own labor or that of his family, depreciation of machinery and horses and interest on his investment. A farmer is entitled to a fair rate of interest on his investment as much as a banker or merchant, and to ordinary wages for his labor, and these items should be included in the cost of production. It is undoubtedly true in many cases where unscientific farming is being carried on upon high priced land, that if all these expenses such as ordinary wages, taxes, interest on investment and depreciation on investment were subtracted from the gross receipts from the farm, the net returns would be found to small that it would have been more profitable to invest the same amount of money in stocks and bonds. In other words the net income received from investment this money in stocks or bonds would be greater than the net income derived from the operation of the farm and in addition all the farm labor would be saved. There is only one method of finding out whether or not this is true and that is by keeping an exact and scientific account.
