Farm and Garden

PREPARING LAND FOR OATS.

Spring Disking Gives Nearly as Good Results as Fall Plowing.

Farmers usually give little attention to seed bed preparation for oats. When oats follow corn in the rotation the cornstalks are usually disked over in the spring and the oats sown broadcast or drilled. There are some farmers, however, who plow their land in the fall, leaving it rough during the winter and thus putting it in better condition to absorb moisture during the winter and early spring. Others, not having time to plow in the fall, plow their ground in the spring before seeding.

Experiments carried on by the agronomy department of the Kansas State Agricultural college show that so far as yield is concerned spring disking is practically as good as either spring or fall plowing. Plowing, however, has the advantage of turning under all stubble and trash. In the case of fall plowing, moreover, the ground dries faster in the spring and seeding, therefore, may be done earlier. This is

SAMPLE OF OATS FROM DISKED SEED BED.

Sometimes highly important since a profitable yield of oats often depends on getting them sown so early as to make them mature in time to escape hot winds and drought. In some seasons where ground is not fall plowed it is necessary to plow or disk the ground in the spring when it is entirely too wet, which may injure it for several years. If, on the other hand, the plowing or disking is not done when the ground is too wet it will be necessary to delay seeding until there is practically no chance of getting a good crop.

It appears from results secured up to the present time that where plowing for any reason cannot be done in the fall disking is practically as good and sometimes better than spring plowing. In western Kansas it seems even better in ordinary seasons than fall plowing. This is probably due to the fact that oats require a compact seed bed, and when ground is plowed in the spring it does not have time to become thoroughly settled before the crop is sown. It would seem desirable when plowing in the spring for oats either to plow rather shallow or else to disk the land thoroughly before seeding.

Keep the Plows Clean.
How nice it is to hitch to a plow and have it clean right off when you first start! The first day of the plowing does not seem such a bad job then. But when you have to work half a day to get the plow to scour you're apt to have some pessimistic thoughts in regard to farm work. It is so easy to neglect the plows when a job of plowing is done, leaving them exposed to the weather, but when the time again comes to hitch to those plows and one sees the condition they are in, why, then, we are apt to resolve to take better care of the tools in the future.

DAIRYING AND THE SOIL.

The greatest advantage in dairy farming is its relation to the fertility of the soil. No other system of farming excels in this respect, and but few equal it. A farm used for dairy purposes does not lose in fertility, but gains, and may be used for this purpose almost indefinitely.

When animals or milk products are sold off the farm only a small portion of the fertility of the entire crop is sold. The greater part of the fertilizer elements are returned to the soil by the form of barnyard manure. The fertilizing value of common grains as compared with the fertilizing value of the products of the dairy farm, figured at prices of commercial fertilizer, shows less decrease in fertility by dairy farming.

One ton of butter contains 50 cents' worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of milk contains $2.00 worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of wheat contains $7.75 worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of oats contains $7.26 worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of corn contains $4.75 worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of clover hay contains $9.07 worth of fertilizer constituents.
One ton of alfalfa contains $9.50 worth of fertilizer constituents—Dry Farming and Rural Homes.
