Farm and Garden

GROWING VEGETABLES.

Information as to Soil and Methods of Seed Planting.
(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

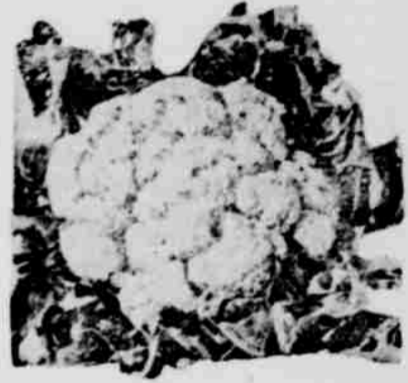

Carrots need to be sown very thickly because the seeds are very small and germinate very slowly. An excellent plan is to sow a few radish seeds with the carrots so as to mark the row and make earlier cultivation possible. Two good varieties are early scarlet horn and Chautauay.

Cauliflower is the most delicate member of the cabbage family. With it the flower is the part used for food. It does best in cool, moist climates.

The greatest success is likely to come if the heads start to form before or after the long hot summer days. It is raised in practically the same manner as cabbage.

Celery should be kept growing steadily all through the season. Any check in its growth—such as frosting, wilting at transplanting time or insufficient supply of moisture—is likely to cause it to go to seed.

Chard or Swiss chard is an excellent plant for providing greens during the late summer. It has leaves that resemble beet leaves, except that they are a light yellowish green. The leaves are prepared the same as spinach and the stalks and midribs are used the same as asparagus.

Cucumbers.—The earliest cucumbers are raised by sowing the seed in dirt bands about a month before seed can be sown out of doors. A heavy soil is preferred for raising a good crop for pickling. Almost any of the various strains of the white spine will do well. For pickling the Chicago pickling and Boston pickling varieties are very popular.

Egg plants require a long season and a high temperature. In our hot dry summers they will do very well if the plants are started early. The fruits are mostly black or purple in color, of rather variable size and shape. They are usually sliced and fried for serving. New York purple is a good variety.

Endive is raised as a very early crop in spring, but better as a late fall crop. It is blanched in order to reduce its bitterness and make it more tender. Blanching is done in two or three weeks by tying the tops together. Endive is often stored for winter use in the same way as is celery.

Horseshoe is a perennial plant, but is generally grown as an annual. It is raised by planting root cuttings about four or six inches long with the tops about three inches below the surface of the soil and about eighteen inches apart in the row. These root cuttings are the lateral roots trimmed off of the large roots when they are harvested. The roots should all be harvested at the end of the first year, taking care not to break off any side roots that would be left in the soil, or the horseshoe will become a very bothersome weed.

Kohlrabi is the member of the cabbage family with an enlarged stem. It is often called turnip rooted cabbage. It is raised by either transplanting the plants for early use or sowing the seed outdoors and thinning to about six or eight inches. In quality it is superior to turnips.

LIME-SULPHUR SPRAY.

The simplest form of lime-sulphur solution and probably the best for you to experiment with is the so called self boiled solution, says the Orange Judd Farmer. This is made of eight pounds of stone lime, eight pounds of powdered sulphur and fifty gallons of water. It is best made in large quantities because a larger amount of heat is developed by the lime than if only a small amount is made at once.

Supposing you want to make 200 gallons of the mixture, put thirty-two pounds of stone lime in a barrel or tub with five or six gallons of water. As soon as the lime begins to slake vigorously put in thirty-two pounds of powdered sulphur. Stir constantly and add more water as needed, so that it forms a thick paste and is thoroughly heated. When the boiling has stopped and before any red or orange streaks appear in the mixture add several gallons of cold water to cool it. Strain it, dilute the 200 gallons and the mixture is ready to put in the spray machine and apply. The other forms of lime-sulphur solution are somewhat similar, but are made by boiling the mixture in a kettle.

Think of It

Actually from 24 to 36 per cent on the investment or about 1/3 of the net return from that house you rented. Can you invest $100.00 any better.
