"THE BUBBLE"

In the present day agitation over blue sky artists and Tea Pot Dome investigations, the lesson which is delightfully and entertainingly presented in Edwin Locke's great play, "The Bubble" will dig deep into the experiences of many who have encountered the oily promoter or stock salesman. The play, which the New tried and tested comedy that cannot fail" is to be presented at the Chautaqua the second night of the program by the well known Elias Day players.

Boiled down and served captivating style in this famous three act play are the necessary elements of the girl, the modest hero, the deep died villain with the get-rich-scheme the gullible old folks, the escapes from ruin, and, of course, the love story. But the old plot is given a turn that causes it to "thicken" in an entirely new way. Louis Mann selected "The Bubble" as a vehicle in which to star and it became one of his greatest triumphs.

The wily stock promoter, who is the outstanding figures in this production, is said to be so realistic and clever that he makes those afflicted with the virus of ambition want to buy stock themselves. Those who have dallied with the tempting offers of such artists will recognize in him the personification of the tempt-or who paints glowing pictures of easy money. The hero is a wise boy —a reporter, who brings about many convulsing situations in his eventually successful effort to block the game of the promoter. The scenes are laid in the home of the parents, the Gustave Muellers, who conduct a delicatessen, and the gradual unwinding of this kaleidos-copic comedy plot provokes more joyous, hearty laughter than one could imagine possible in such an environment.

"The Bubble," proclaimed "an effective play of dialect, humor and pathos" is irresistible and notwithstanding the moments of heart gripping pathos, resolves into a regular laughing contest. It contains three acts and will be presented by an excellent cast.

KNOWING ONE'S SELF

By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Dean of Man, University of Illinois.

"I'D LIKE nothing better," Rust said to me when we were boys a good many years ago. "than to be able to run a farm of my own; I know I could make money," and he launched into a narrative of detail in an endeavor to prove to me just what, in such a case, he was sure he could accomplish. Even with my boyish inexperience, I felt that Rust's plans were chimerical, and I entertained the gravest doubts as to his being able to carry them out if he were given the chance.
He has had a farm to manage, for these years, but he is still a poor man.
It is a valuable asset, and a rare one, I sometimes think, for a man to be able adequately and justly to estimate his own strength and his own weakness, to know what he can do best, and to know also, what his limitations are.

A wise old man whom I once knew used to say in speaking of the somewhat difficult and treacherous game of poker with which he had considerable practice, "if a man does not know the cards, he ought not to play the game." I am sure that many men whom I have observed in the game of life have had a very faulty appreciation of the value of the cards which they were holding in their hands, and sometimes threw away their ace and were disappointed when they did not take the trick with a two-spot.

When I was engaged in the teaching of composition and an eager boy came to me at the beginning of the semester with the statement, "I know I am going to manage your course all right, because composition has always been my easiest subject." I knew almost to a certainty that I had struck a man who could not spell, who had no knowledge of even the elements of grammar, and whose literary possibilities were pretty hopeless.

Powers was a good illustration of the man who did not know himself. He was an unusually dramatic and magnetic speaker; he had an excellent brain, good training, and an attractive physique. He was deeply and sincerely religious and possessed one of the most winning personalities I have ever known. As a preacher he could have had any crowd at his feet. He was obsessed, however, with the idea of being a business man; yet every business which he touched collapsed under his hand. He began life with a modest fortune, but at fifty it was gone; he had sunk it all in first one visionary scheme and then another; but he still kept on, convinced that ultimately he would make his fortune.

There are reasons, I have no doubt, why few of us know ourselves less well than we should. We all hate criticism; we take advice unwillingly.
We attempt the things that we want very much to be able to do without considering seriously how well fitted we are for the accomplishment of these things. We listen to the flatter-er with a more willing ear than to the candid friend who sometimes not very kindly points out to us the aunts we are loath to admit.

Voile and Val Lace in Summer Frocks

At the head of the procession of summer finery for little girls, comes a gay company of voile frocks in light colors. They are as cheerful as a bed of tulips and as practical as bread and butter. Some of them are trimmed with val laces, and others with outline embroidery, tucks, needlework or hemstitching. Pink, blue, yellow, green, and pretty shades of red in different shades, make a choice of color that will please every one. One of the new models for a little girl of seven or more, is shown in the frock pictured. It is of shrimp pink and so simply made that the picture tells the whole story of its design. For those who choose silk, crepe de chine is recommended for this dress.

If more children in this country were properly brought up fewer would have to be sent up.

Most any Vernonia man is willing to go on a diet if he does not have to give up anything but carrots and salad dressing.
