truly "the widest place in the road." The first thing you see as you approach East as you approach the town is the "Laughing Gas Station" Then is a nice grocery store and restaurant and at the gas station and a repair shop near by where tourists get repairs. Across the railroad from the gas station one the Blue Rock Inn, Dick Wick Halls office and a little further back Dick Wicks home. The grease wood Golf course completes the picture. Dick Wick Hall looks like a major general off on a vacation only he does not affect the fussy fixings that city folks wear when vacationing. He holds his pants up with suspenders and his face open with a smile. He owns the town of Salome, prints the Salome sun on a mimeograph

just for the kick he gets out of it and has the largest unpaid subscription list in the world. When he is not printing the Salome Sun, writing articles for the Saturday Evening Post sprinkling the streets, showing rattlesnakes away from Eastern tourists or a few of the other manifold duties incumbent upon a man who is boss of a thriving metropolis of the size of Salome he takes a month or so off and covers the greasewood Golf Course. This course is so extensive that it sometimes takes from June to January to play the 18 holes.

Paul Robinson asked the writer to dash off something about a 4500 mile trip through Oregon California and Arizona and in attempting this it is natural that the most interesting spot should get the most space. We got a Salome frog, a Kodak picture of Dick Wick Hall, a cactus log, a mouth full of sand, a mass of blisters from the sun, a porched tongue and a few other impressions in the Salome country and I would advise anyone who expects to make an auto trip anywhere to be sure and see Salome. It is twentyfold as interesting, thrilling hair raising an everything as taking all the degrees in the sons and daughters of "I will arise" and more spectacular than playing the leading role in the grand procession of the "over the River Burying Society."

A Return Traveler.
