each year produce a surplus, and diversify instead with livestock, dairying, fruit, vegetables and other cash crops that may be marketed profitably. Diversification such as this has helped solve the seasonal labor problem.

The third type of farming that is leading to greater farm income is irrigation. When thoroughly understood and intelligently practiced irrigation lessens the hazard of a bad crop year and assures a steady annual production. Under irrigation it is possible, moreover, to carry on a wider range of farm operations.

The price of good farm land as compared with pre-war prices shows a depreciation of from 10 to 25 per cent, with present prices stable.

Taxes? Yes, they are high here as everywhere, but the problem is being taken in hand. Alive to the conditions since the deflation in 1920 our state governments have been following the budget system in expenditures of public funds. Tax commissions have been doing good work; economy programs have been instituted in rural districts by supervisors and favorable results are beginning to appear. While our taxes are high they are not increasing and the outlook is encouraging.

Farm tenancy with its attendant bad results is a question that has not concerned this new country to any extent. In land ownership we show a high percentage, much higher than in the Middle West east and south.

Movement from the farm to the city is stationary, with a definite settlement program under way in all states.

I can recall a few years back when the Pacific northwest was largely a buying region. Today all of this has changed. It has an annual surplus of farm products to sell. Naturally, then, attention is centered and has been for a number of years on a marketing program of surpluses.

Take, as an illustration, the poultry industry. Three states through their cooperative marketing associations controlled by poultrymen market annually close to twenty million dollars' worth of eggs, 75 per cent of which commands a premium on eastern seaboard markets. Many other commodities are marketed by cooperatives through local units. These units harvest and grade the product, then federate and market through a selling exchange. The whole idea has been to put intelligent business methods into the merchandising of Pacific northwest farm products so as to secure a reasonable profit above the cost of production.

Wherever four cardinal principles have been kept in mind, volume, proper financing, good management and loyalty of membership, success has resulted.

Associated with this program of commodity marketing must of necessity come transportation and distribution. In many rural districts are found excellent farm-to-market roads thousands of miles of improved highways for the use of motor trucks and ample railway service. There is also access to distant markets through ocean traffic and the Panama Canal.

Farm organizations have long been important factors out here. The Grange leads all others in membership. The Farm Bureau and Farmer's Union are strong in some sections but their growth during the past five years has been hampered by lack of organized effort. State agricultural colleges and experimental stations through their extension service, field projects and economic surveys are contributing to the practical and scientific side of farm life; state governments are liberal in their appropriations to these institutions.

Our rural schools are worthy of special comment. Illiteracy hardly exists. Consolidation of school districts has taken place with the advent of good roads, and here and there are found county high schools where agriculture is taught and where farm boys and girls are given a training in terms of their life work.

Thousands of farm boys and girls are engaged in club work. There is scarcely a local county or state fair where boys' and girls' exhibitions are not to be found. Modern transportation has made it possible for our farm people to attend city and town churches. There are few rural churches in this region.

Throughout all this vast agricultural domain known as the Pacific northwest there has come a spirit of cooperation that bespeaks growth in the worth-while things. It has brought about a fuller viewpoint of the possibilities in the future and a resolution for progress that cannot be downed.—Farm & Fireside.

the party thought it might be done for much less. It was the consensus of opinion that it would be practicable to have a market road running directly from Vernonia to Scappoose through Chapman and thus open up this rich new section to the new settlers coming to Oregon and looking for just such places. A detailed report will be made at the next Chamber of Commerce meeting here August 4.

Home planting of fruits of different varieties appeals to many Oregon home owners. Some of the advantages pointed out by the experiment station horticultural department are the economic value of the crops and the pleasure of picking one's own fruit. The former saves expense of buying fruits thus supplied and the latter adds to the enjoyment of the home. Fresh fruit direct from the garden in a fully ripe condition has decided advantages over other fruits bought in the market, says the department report.

Oregon grows principally two types of hay says a receipt experiment station report, alfalfa and grain and vetch mixtures. Some clover and grass hays are likewise produced to some extent.
