The members of the civics class who have been studying parliamentary law about three weeks, will spend the remainder of the semester in writing a little book on "Community Civics." It is expected that some real talent as authors may be discovered in the preparation of these original books.

INDOLENCE

(By Della Cline)

Indolence is the foundation of nearly all blunders. Everyone who has grown old enough to look back over the wasted opportunities of life will be likely to attribute most of his blunders to indolence.

Sometimes one has omitted to learn what he needed to learn in order to do the thing he is best fitted for; sometimes one has shrunk from the painful effort required to decide one's course in life, leaving it to fortune to settle what his own will should have settled, and by mere self-indulgent carelessness let the opportunity slip by.

The difference between men who are successful and those who are unsuccessful is not so much due to the difference in intellectual capacity as to the difference between activity and slackness. The man who is alert can see difficulties ahead, and will be able to prevent them before they occur. While the lazy, easy-going man who is not easily aroused by difficulties will not trouble himself to look ahead, thus being unprepared when he loses the opportunities leading to fortune and success.

Therefore, be alert and prepared to meet and overcome obstacles rather than indifferent and easy-going. When faced by difficulty be an overcomer. Lose no golden opportunities.
