Discusses Fire Control

FRESNO, Cal.—The way to prevent forest fires is to start brush fires in the forests, according to W. J. Jones, sheriff of Fresno county for 12 years, and before that a woodsman and mountaineer for a quarter century.

Jones, who is 56, is retiring voluntarily from the office at the end of the year, after holding the position longer than any other man.

"I'm tired of politics," he said. "I'm tired, too, of a lot of foolishness that's being passed off these days as the modern scientific way of doing things."

Particularly is Jones weary of the talk of the forest-fire evil. At the same time, he concedes the situation now is such that every forest fire is a real menace.

"If I've set one fire, I've set his thousand," he said. "And I never did anything but good by doing it."

"Yes, and every old-timer in the Sierras will tell you he's done the same thing, and never did anything but good."

Jones said that the cattlemen of 20, to 40 years ago regularly every fall started setting brush and debris fires.

"That way every year the accumulated forest and brush refuse was burned off. There wasn't any such bedding of debris then as there is now," he said.

"I've read where modern forest fires burn as much as four feet into the ground. And I don't doubt it a bit."

"But the fires we set never burned more than four inches into the ground."

Sheriff Jones said the fires never had a chance to burn deeper because they lacked the debris to make hot fires.

"Cattlemen and lumbermen burned all brush and ground refuse off every year, and before their time the Indians had always set the fires to make good grass for the next year."

"We never started the fires until in the autumn, when there was usually considerable dew or occasional rains."

"Why I've tried for hours to set fires in clearings and among brush that looked like they would flare right up. There never was any accumulation of the dry stuff that you will see in every Sierra forest these days."

"I never saw a forest fire burn deep into big timber, although I once saw a fire 20 miles long and five miles wide."

"Not long ago I saw where a recent fire had swept over the hills. Every stick of standing timber had burned deep into the wood. It was all dead."

"My time in the woods was before all this talk about forest conservation."

Jones paused a moment. "You know," he said, "there'll always be forest fires. Lightning will set them, if nothing else does. I think it was August 11 I saw where lightning started 20 fires in the Modoc National Forest alone."

"We had fires in my day in the hills. We had lots of them. But we never had fires that ruined good standing timber."
