AN EXTRAVAGANT ECONOMY

The proposed measure to move the University of Oregon to Corvallis, the normal schools to Eugene, the law school to Salem, and establish junior colleges at Ashland and La Grande, is one of the most extravagant measures of economy that has ever been seriously advocated in Oregon.

As the board of higher education has pointed out, an extensive building program would be immediately necessary at Corvallis to accommodate the 2700 additional students now attending the state university, the four and a half million dollar investment in lands and buildings at Eugene would be only partially utilized by the less than 1000 normal students transferred there, the $700,000 investment at Monmouth would be abandoned, quarters at Salem would have to be acquired or rented for the law school, and other similar expenses incurred, all for the purpose of economizing (supposedly) in operating costs.

Such an ill-advised and unbalanced scheme to save the taxpayers' money by spending big sums for construction and readjustment, and rendering valueless much of what has already been invested, does not even deserve a place on the ballot. The petition shovers (at ten cents per name, no doubt) should be turned down flatly and finally.
