Outside Help Not To Be Hired for Fighting Fires

With approximately 23,000 men in the president's emergency conservation work camps in Oregon and Washington, it will not be necessary to hire outside help for forest fire fighting this summer, according to F. H. Brundage, assistant regional forester in charge of fire control. This is in line with the present economy methods of the government, it is said.

Each of the 200-man camps is being organized on the basis of a fire suppression unit. From the camp personnel men are being selected and trained for fire crew formen, fire crew straw bosses, and other positions necessary to handle the fire fighters on large fires, should any occur.

The entire crew in each camp is being given training in fire line construction and in the handling of the usual fire fighting tools. Many of the local woodsmen quota already have forest fire fighting experience, but to the eastern youths the work is largely a new experience.

Already several of the camps have been called on for fire fighting services, and the army officers as well as the men have responded with fine spirit, according to Mr. Brundage.

"It is my belief that any fires we may happen to have this summer will be exceptionally well handled," said the fire control chief. "With the cooperation of the army officers, the experience and ability of our forestry overhead and woodsmen quota, and the willingness of the enrolled men, we should be able to write a gratifying record for the 1933 forest fire season. Of course it should be remembered that every time these men have to fight fire they are being taken from more constructive work. It is to be hoped that the forest-using public will cooperate in preventing fires, so that the ECW men can build trails and make other forest improvements instead of having to fight unnecessary man-caused forest fires, which destroy resources, and do no one any good."
