THINK AGAIN

The young man was a very persistent suitor. His girl had warned him over and over again that her father was strongly opposed to her having boy friends, but he would call on her all the same.

On this particular night he was determined that he would at last ask her father's consent. He was sitting on the sofa, when heavy foot-falls were heard outside, the father came in.

"Who the blazes are you?" he demanded angrily. The youth gulped and turned pale. "It's all right, sir," he gasped at last. "I'm her brother!"—London Answers Magazine.

Customer—I see you've reduced the price of boiled eggs. Are you serving a different grade of eggs? Waiter—None. They're some eggs of the same lot we served six months ago for four bits.

Ear to Ear

Make-up Expert—I'm having trouble making up the face of Miss Blank for that new part. I wish I could make her mouth bigger. Director—I don't see how you can unless you take her ears off.—The Mentor.

He Was Out of Reach

Bobbie—Say, Pa, a bee hums, doesn't he? Father—Yes, my boy; but run away and don't bother me. Bobbie—Well, Pa, if that's so, ain't a bee a humbug?

A Costly Joke

Auctioneer—You keep bidding against yourself, sir. Customer—No, I'm not. My wife and my brother both asked me to bid for this gramophone, and I'm curious to see which of 'em gets it.

Medals

"Did your boy win any medals at school?" "No," replied Mr. Growcher, "but I'm going to see that the teacher who put up with him for the entire term gets one."
